August Wilhelm von Schlegel (1767-1845) was an authority on Roman authors and an expert Greek student, and attained great renown for his Hebrew works, especially his epoch-making grammar and lexicon "De rudimentis hebraicis." João Rodrigues, Jesuit missionary (1558-1633), compiled a Japanese-Portuguese dictionary but is best known for his important "Arte da lingoa de Japanl," Nagasaki, 1604. Juan Romero, Jesuit missionary (1559-1630), acquired a more or less fluent knowledge of several Indian languages, particularly of the Guaraní of Paraguay, on which he was an authority. Heinrich Roth, Jesuit (1620-68), was one of the pioneer European students of Sanskrit, and his published works include a Sanskrit grammar, \textit{Buenaventura Sijíar}, O.F.M. 1759-1808, compiled a vocabulary of the Telame Indian language, with the pronunciation and Spanish explanations.

Adrian Turnebus (1512-65) was a professor of Greek and wrote numerous commentaries on the ancient classics. Pierre Willems (1840-98) was an exact and conscientious scholar and the author of several philological works, chiefly "Le droit public romain" and "Le Sénat de la république romaine." Johann Kaspar Zевus (1806-56) was an eminent linguist, ethnologist, and historian, and founded Celtic philology by writing his monumental "Grammatica Celtica," which put Celtic philology on a sound scientific basis and is of fundamental importance to all Celtic scholars.

(2) Other Christian Philologists. Isaac Casaubon (1559-1614) was a professor of languages and a classical scholar, and is well known for his "Ars Nova Lingua de Japanl," Nagasaki, 1604. Juan Romero, Jesuit missionary (1559-1630), acquired a more or less fluent knowledge of several Indian languages, particularly of the Guarani of Paraguay, on which he was an authority. Heinrich Roth, Jesuit (1620-68), was one of the pioneer European students of Sanskrit, and his published works include a Sanskrit grammar, \textit{Buenaventura Sijíar}, O.F.M. 1759-1808, compiled a vocabulary of the Telame Indian language, with the pronunciation and Spanish explanations.

Philosophy (Gr., \textit{philo}, love; \textit{ sophia}, wisdom), a term the literal meaning of which is love of wisdom. Philosophy is expected to give a man a complete view of the world and his place in it. Many define philosophy as the science of the totality of things, or that science which is concerned with the first and farthest causes of all reality. It is sometimes called the science of sciences. However, the term science is applied to philosophy in a very general sense. Today philosophy may be regarded as a logical system of inferences from facts supplied by the particular sciences, attempting to give an ultimate explanation of all being. Being, as such, and its most general divisions, constitute the object of the branch of philosophy called ontology, or general metaphysics. Man tries to give a special branch of philosophy named theology, or natural theology, to distinguish it from theology based on revelation. Man then questions the conditions of knowledge and its validity and endeavors to give a critical account of it, which gives rise to the theory of knowledge, or epistemology. He questions the rules which he himself must follow in order to act correctly, and these are supplied by logic. He finds that he must act, and act rightly; ethics supplies the rules of man's conduct and the ultimate reasons of right and wrong.

Phoenix, emblem of immortality, a bird like an eagle which came out of Arabia every 500 years to Helios, where it burned itself on the altar and rose again from its ashes, young and beautiful. The word phoenix might possibly be read instead of palm tree in Job, 29, which seems to refer to the belief in its immortality.

Photius of Constantinople (c. 815-887), chief author of the great schism between the East and West, b. Constantinople. Having previously held high offices in the Byzantine Court he was intruded into the patriarchate of Constantinople in place of the rightful patriarch, Ignatius, who had been deposed and banished for seeking to correct the vices of Bardas, regent for the young emperor, Michael the Drunkard. Nicholas I declared his election illegal, but Photius denied his authority and retaliated by excommunicating the Pope and the Latins, proclaiming as his chief reason for so doing that they had added \textit{filioque} to the Creed. Upon the death of Michael III, Photius was deposed and banished and Ignatius restored to the Patriarchate. Photius, however, succeeded in ingratiating himself with the new Emperor Basil I and organized a strong party, which, upon the death of Ignatius, demanded his appointment to the see. The Pope (John VIII) agreed, absolved him from all censure, and acknowledged him as patriarch. Photius immediately renewed the old quarrel and at a synod held in St. Sophia's (879) which he had persuaded the pope to call, repeated all his accusations against the Latins, dwelling especially on the Filioque grievance. He was again excommunicated, and upon the accession of Leo VI to the throne was deposed and sent into exile, where he died. Of Photius' prolific literary production may be mentioned the "Myriobiblion" or "Bibliotheca," a collection of notes on, and extracts from 280 volumes of classical authors, the originals of which are now in large part lost; and "Amphilochia," a collection of questions and answers on biblical, philosophical, and theological difficulties. —C.E.; Fortescue, The Orthodox Eastern Church, Lond., 1907.

Phylacteries, fi-lak’ter-iz (Gr., phyllaktieron, safeguard, charm), two small square leather cases worn by Jews during prayer, one on the forehead, the other on the left upper arm. They contained the following passages written on parchment: Exodus, 13, 1-10; 11-16, and Deuteronomy, 6, 4-9; 11, 13-21. The cases were fastened to, and held in place by, long leather straps (phylaktoria) and were worn by all Jews except women and children, and by converts to Judaism. A pectoral, the practical unit of electrical current, is named in his honor. Jacques Babinet (1794-1872), invented various instruments to be used in the study of physics, but is best known for his work on optics, in which he advanced "Babinet's theorem," dealing with the diffraction of light. Giovanni Battista Becaira (1716-81), as a professor of experimental physics, reached important new conclusions concerning the reactions of electricity and of air to electrified bodies. Antoine César Becquerel (1788-1878) constructed a cell on which the "Daniell" cell was later based, invented a differential galvanometer to measure electrical resistances, and is known as the founder of the science of electro-chemistry. Antoine Henri Becquerel (1852-1908) is the founder of radio-activity; his discovery of "Becquerel's Rays," i.e., the invisible radiations from uranium, won him a share in the Nobel physics prize for 1903. Edward Branley (1846-1908) made wireless telegraphy possible by his invention of the coherer or "Radio-conductor Branley." Charles Augustus Coulomb (1736-1800) is famous for his researches on the laws of friction and for his invention of the "torsion balance," an instrument to detect and measure electricity; the coulomb, the practical unit of quantity of electricity, is named in his honor. Patrick Bernard Delany (1845-1924) was a prolific inventor, holding over 150 patents protecting his appliances in the coincident telegraphing of sound, light, and heat. Louis Fizeau (1819-96) was associated with Foucault in the great optical experiments leading to the downfall of the emission theory, and was the first to determine experimentally the velocity of light, and to show that light-ether is carried along by moving bodies. Jean Bernard Foucault (1819-68), refuted the corpuscular theory of light and invented the Foucault pendulum and a gyroscope by which he visibly demonstrated the rotation of the earth; also invented an apparatus which automatically regulates the electric light. His name has been given to certain electrical currents (also called eddy currents), because of his careful study of the subject. Joseph von Fraunhofer (1787-1826) initiated spectrum analysis, discovered the Fraunhofer lines in the solar spectrum and established the laws of dif-fraction. Augustin-Jean Fresnel (1788-1827) was notable for his research in optics; he revolutionized lighthouse illumination by his system of lenses, formulated the laws of the interference of polarized light, and developed the Fresnel theory. Galileo Galilei (1564-1642) established the laws of falling bodies, gave the first direct demonstration of the laws of equilibrium, discovered the isochronism of the pendulum, and virtually invented the telescope, which led to his famous discoveries in astronomy (q.v.). Luigi Galvani (1737-98) discovered current or "Galvanic" electricity while studying anatomy, and thereby prepared the way for the science of electro-chemistry. Zénobe Théophile Gramme (1826-1901) invented independently, and promoted the extensive use of, the ring-wound armature dynamo which another Catholic, Antonio Pacinotti (d.
1912) had invented in 1860. Francesco Maria Grimaldi, S.J. (1613-63), discovered the phenomenon diffraction and the principle of interference, and was the first to observe the dispersion of the sun's rays in passing through a prism. René Just Haüy (1743-1822) was one of the pioneers in the development of pyro-electricity. Edme Mariotte (c. 1620-84) made experiments in heat, light, and hydrostatics, and established the law of gases which bears his name. Carlo Matteucci (1811-68) made important investigations in electrostatics, electro-dynamics, and electro-physiology. Macendino Mel-loni (1798-1854) made important researches regarding radiant heat, discovered its identity with light, and perfected the use of the thermopile for heat measurements. Leopoldo Nobili (1784-1835) invented the thermopile later perfected by Melloni, the astatic needle, and experimented in animal electricity. Victor Regnault (1810-78) made valuable determinations of the specific heat of solids, liquids, gases, etc., and invented accurate instruments for further investigations in this field. Evangelista Torricelli (1608-47) discovered the law of efflux of a liquid through a small aperture in the wall of a vessel, improved the telescope, and invented the barometer. Alessandro Volta (1745-1827) was a student of atmospheric electricity and a professor of physics who invented the electrophorus and the first voltaic battery; the latter is named in his honor, as is the unit of electromotive force, the volt.
(2) Other Christian Physicists. Robert Boyle (1627-91) improved the air pump, experimented in pneumatics, and formulated the law of gases which bears his name. David Brewster (1781-1868) discovered fluorescence and invented the kaleidoscope and the lensed spectrope. Michael Faraday (1791-1867) is preeminent in the science of electricity for all time because of his important experiments and discoveries; the farad, the electromagnetic unit of electric capacity, was so named in his honor. Hermann Ludwig Ferdinand von Helmholtz (1821-94) invented the opthalmoscope and was noted for his important discoveries in optics and acoustics. Heinrich Hertz (1857-94) made important discoveries concerning electromagnetic waves.
Christian Huygens (1629-95) discovered polarization, developed the wave theory of light, explained the laws of reflection and refraction later confirmed by Fresnel's experiments, and paved the way for Newton by his statement of the laws which, in regular motion, govern the magnitude of centrip-etal force. James Prescott Joule (1818-89) formulated the important "Joule's Law" and made researches in the mechanical equivalent of heat.
James Clerk Maxwell (1831-79) discovered the existence of electromagnetic waves and made valuable investigations in electricity and magnetism.
Julius Robert Mayer (1814-78) made researches on bodily heat and of heat in general, and is regarded by many as the originator of the mechanical theory of heat. Sir Isaac Newton (1642-1727) made many important investigations on optics, established the science of theoretical mechanics, and discovered the law of universal gravitation. Hans Christian Oersted (1777-1851) was an important pioneer in the study of electro-magnetism. Georg Simon Ohm (1787-1854) made valuable researches concerning galvanic currents and discovered the famous "Ohm's Law" which is one of the fundamental principles of the mathematical theory of electricity. The unit of electrical resistance was named the ohm in his honor. W. J. Macquorn Rankine (1820-72) is considered one of the founders of the science of thermodynamics. Werner von Siemens (1823-92) formulated the principle of the dynamo and made other important contributions to the science of elecctricity. Sir George Gabriel Stokes (1819-1903) discovered the refrangibility of light and made important researches in optics and hydro-dynamics. John William Strutt, Baron Rayleigh (1842-1919), made valuable observations on optics, the theory of sound, varying electric and magnetic problems, and chemi-ical physics in general. Benjamin Thompson, Count Von Rumford (1753-1814), made accurate experiments in the heat evolved by friction. Sir William Thompson, Lord Kelvin (1824-1907), made notable discoveries in the mathematical theories of electricity, heat, and magnetism, invented the mirror galvanometer, and made valuable researches and developments in thermodynamics. Thomas Young (1773-1829) discovered the principle of interference afterwards discovered by Fresnel and prepared the revival of undulatory optics by his memorable discoveries, and is justly called "the founder of physiological optics."—C.E.; Kneller, Christianity and the Leaders of Modern Science, St. L., 1910.

Physiologus (Gr., physiologos, one who discourses on nature), a collection of Christian al-egories dating probably from the 2nd century in which religious truths are symbolized by animals, e.g., Christ's saving of mankind by His Crucifixion is represented by the pelican who feeds its offspring by shedding its own blood. It derives its name from the introductory phrase of each tale "the physi-ologus (naturalist) says." Various translations and adaptations of the original Greek text have been made and the numerous "Bestiaries" derived much of their material from it. It was universally popular in the Middle Ages and exerted a wide influence on medieval literature and ecclesiastical art.—C.E.

Piazzi, Giuseppe (1746-1826), astronomer, b.
Ponte, Italy; d. Naples. He entered the Society of Theatines at Milan, was professor of dogmatic theology at Rome, 1779, and of mathematics at Palermo, 1780; director of the new observatory there, 1791, and of that at Naples, 1817. He discovered the first planetoid, Ceres, 1 Jan., 1801, and published star-catalogues in 1803 and 1814.—C.E.

Pichler, renowned Austrian family of gem-cutters. Antonio or Johann Anton (1697-1779), b. Brixen, Austria; d. Rome. He was a talented goldsmith and engraver of precious stones. Giovanni or Johann Anton (1734-91), son of preceding, a painter and gem cutter, b. Naples; d. Rome. He wrought gems of exquisite beauty: “Hercules,” “Sappho,” and portraits of Pius VI and Emperor Joseph II. Giacomo, son of preceding, a gem-cutter who executed many works in Naples. Giuseppe or Johann Joseph (1760-1829), son of Antonio, half-brother of Giacomo, a distinguished painter and gem cutter, b. Rome; d. there. Giovanni executed innumerable cameos and gems for the popes and sovereigns of his day. His “Head of Ajax” is in a gold case in the Vatican collection.—C.E.

Picpus, Congregation of. See Congregation of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary.

Picquet, Francois (1708-81), Sulpician missionary, b. Bourg, France; d. Verjon. For 25 years he labored among the Indians in Canada, learning the Algonquin and Iroquois tongues and founding Indian posts, one of which, the Port of the Presenta­tion, became the town of Ogdensburg, New York.—C.E.

Picts, a race of people who occupied the eastern part of Scotland. Probably of Celtic origin mixed with a remnant of a pre-Celtic race, the date of their arrival in Scotland is unknown. They were defeated by the Romans, 369 A.D.; after their con­quest a race of people who occupied the eastern part of Scotland. Probably of Celtic origin mixed with a remnant of a pre-Celtic race, the date of their arrival in Scotland is unknown. They were defeated by the Romans, 369 A.D.; after their con­quest they were moved readily to the filial love of God, becoming in a higher degree an habitual appreciation of the Fatherhood of God and of what it imports. Thus they not only facilitates the exercise of the virtue, but effects also an habitual reverence for whatever is connected with the Divine service: the poor in whom we are to honor Him, the sacraments, the Church, and the altar.

Pilar, Nuestra Sehora del (Our Lady of the Pillar), a celebrated church in Baroque style (1681), and a shrine at Saragossa, Spain, containing a miraculous image of the Blessed Virgin, the object of very special devotion throughout the kingdom. The image stands on a marble pillar and was crowned, 1905, with a crown designed by the Marquis of Griñi and valued at 450,000 pesetas ($92,850.00).—C.E.

Pilaster (M. L., pilaster, little pillar), an engaged pier projecting slightly from the wall, having a capital and base; first used in Roman architecture, but came into broader usage during the Renaissance period.

Pilate, Pontius, Roman procurator of Judea (26-36 A.D.), of equestrian rank. He tried and con­demned Jesus Christ to death. He is the subject of many legends; the Abyssinian and Coptic churches believe that he afterwards became a Christian and was martyred; they venerate him as a saint.—C.E. Pilgrim, Costume of, emblem in art associated with St. Roch, St. James, and St. Alexis Falconieri.

Pilgrimage of Grace, the name of a religious uprising in northern England, 1536, led by Robert Aske. Its purpose was the restoration of the Catholic religion and the reestablishment of the religious orders in their confiscated abbeys. Successful at first, after the arrest and execution of the leaders, and four abbots, it was easily suppressed.—C.E.; Gasquet, Henry VIII and the English Monasteries, Lond., 1925.

Pilgrimages (M. E., pilgrime, traveler), journeys made to some shrine for the purpose of worship, or to ask there for spiritual aid, or to discharge some religious obligation. From the earliest days of Christianity it has been the custom of all nationalities to travel to the Holy Land to venerate the spots made sacred by Our Lord. History records famous pilgrimages made to Palestine, the routes followed, the people met, and the scenes visited. The Pilgrimage of St. Helena, c. 325, gave the impetus to the numerous pilgrimages that followed. The famous Bordeaux Pilgrimage, 333, was the first of a long series of pilgrimages which have left us accurate accounts of contemporary conditions in Palestine; even more famous is the "Peregrinatio S. Silvini," St. Jerome, whose personality dominated both East and West, devoted himself to the study of Scripture in the Holy Land, and upon his return to Rome, so enthusiastically spread his love for the scenes of Our Lord's life, that many Romans accompanied him on his return journey to Palestine, where he founded monasteries and convents, and a Latin colony which in later ages inaugurated the Crusades. The tombs of the Apostles and the resting places of the martyrs became popular centers of pilgrimage. Since in the early days of the Church dying martyrs had the privilege of absolving from ecclesiastical penalties, their intercession was sought, through veneration of their tombs, and the scenes of their martyrdom, to remove the taints and penalties of sin. Pilgrimages were set down by the Church as canonical punishments for certain crimes. The hardships of the journey, the wearing of the penitential garb, and the begging it entailed, made the pilgrimage a real and efficient penance. Later, for greater crimes, pilgrimages to the tombs of the Apostles at Rome, to the shrine of St. James at Compostella, to St. Thomas's body at Canterbury, or to the relics of the Three Kings at Cologne, were imposed. In modern times the most frequent centers of pilgrimage are: Rome, Jerusalem, Padua (St. Anthony), and Loreto in Italy, Bruges (relic of the Holy Blood), in Belgium, Guadalupe, Montserrat and Saragossa in Spain, Einsiedeln in Switzerland, Lourdes, Chartres and Fourvières in France, Walsingham and Canterbury in England. Knocks in Ireland, Guadalupe in Mexico, St. Anne de Beaupré in Canada, the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception, Washington, and Auriesville, N. Y. (North American Martyrs). Pilgrimages have done much to advance international communication, and to build up towns and roads. From the idea of pilgrimages arose the Crusades, and the religious orders founded to care for the pilgrims. To them, also, is attributed, to a great extent, the origin of miracle plays.—C.E.

Pilgrim's Progress, John Bunyan's allegory, written in a crude and tedious style and containing a portrayal of the sovereign pontiff as "Giant Pope" who, grown old, is no longer able to harm the pilgrims. It describes the journey of "Christian" to the Celestial City. "A Modern Pilgrim's Progress" (London), a Catholic version of a soul's spiritual journey, written by F. Anstee Baker after her conversion, describes an Anglican woman's search for the shrine of Truth, which she found in the Catholic Church.

Pillar, The Holy, the marble column at which Our Lord was scourged. Half of the original pillar is preserved in the church of St. Praxedes, Rome; the remainder being in Jerusalem. The relic was transported to Rome from Jerusalem, 1223, by Card. John Coloma.

Pillar of Cloud (PILLAR OF FIRE), a low-lying cloud, luminous at night, which accompanied the Israelites during their wandering. By means of this miraculous phenomenon (Ex., 13), the Lord led the Hebrews of the Exodus for 40 years. It was a symbol of the leadership of Christ. Usually the cloud went before Israel, but in Exodus, 14, it went behind, lighting their way, but presenting impenetrable darkness to the Egyptians, so that they could not attack.—C.E. (A. E. B.)

Pilot, The, official weekly organ of the Archdiocese of Boston, published in Boston; founded, 1829; circulation 50,000.

Pinturicchio, painter, b. Perugia, Italy; d. Siena. The pupil of Fiorenzo di Lorenzo, he assisted Perugino, 1482, in the decoration of the Sixtine Chapel; the "Baptism of Christ" and the "Journey of Moses into Egypt" being generally attributed to his hand. His work was mainly fresco done in tempera; brilliant in color and enlivened with gold relief. He decorated a chapel of the church of Ara Coeli with incidents of the life of St. Bernard of Siena. His greatest accomplishment was the decoration of the Borgia Apartments in the Vatican, executed for Alexander VI, and including an unflattering portrait of the patron. In the Piccolomini Library of the cathedral of Siena he painted ten scenes from the life of the future Pius II, helped possibly by the young Raphael. Essentially a decorative artist, his religious paintings lack spirituality.—C.E.

Pious Fund of the Californias, The, had its origin in 1697 in the voluntary donations to the Society of Jesus for the propagation of the faith in California; for the expansion of the Jesuits. In 1768, the Crown of Spain administered the fund until the Mexicans achieved independence, 1821, when Mexico administered it until 1840. When Upper California was ceded to the United States, 1848, the bishops of California demanded part of the fund and presented claims to the Mexican and American Mixed Claims Commission, which referred the question to the British ambassador in Washington. He decided for the bishops of California, who were destined for the interest between 1869 and 1874, when they were awarded this by The Hague (its first international controversy), 1902. The government of Mexico then paid annually to the United States for the use of the prelates of California a sum considered as a "perpetual annuity," until 1912. In 1925 a Claims Commission was appointed at Washington, D. C., by the United States and Mexico and to this body the United States has presented a claim for the payments due since 1913 to the archbishops and bishops of California.—C.E.

Pious Society of Missions ( Pallottines), founded by Ven. Vincent Pallotti, at Rome, 1835; definitely approved, 1904. It grew out of the Apostolic labors of its founder who ministered unceasingly to the sick, the poor, and those in prison. It is governed by a rector-general and procurator residing at Rome. In the United States the society is established in New York, Baltimore, Md., Newark, N. J., and Fall River, Mass. Statistics: 2 regions, 4 provinces, 76 houses, 850 religious.—C.E.

Pious Society of St. Jerome, The, founded, 1901, by Mgr. Giacomo della Chiesa, who later became Benedict XV. The purpose of the society is to spread the Gospels among Italian-speaking Catholics, and to acquaint them with their proper use and advantages. Its principal publication is a volume of the four Gospels and the Acts, in a new and good Italian translation, with useful notes. It also publishes the Gospels of Matthew and Luke separately. The larger volume is at present in its 300th edition, and between 1901 and 1926 over a million copies had been distributed. All the books are issued through the Vatican Press, and no profit is realized. The society is supported by voluntary subscriptions, is controlled by both laymen and clerics, and has received the formal approval of both Pius X and Benedict XV. (z. a. c.)

Pisa, city in central Italy, and former republic. A Roman city in the 2nd century B.C., it developed into a powerful republic early in the 11th century, when it was subjected to continual attacks from the Saracens. It played a prominent part in the Crusades, was the head of the Ghibellines in Tuscany, and was a formidable rival of Genoa and Florence, to whom it finally succumbed in 1309. Its subsequent history coincides with that of Florence, and in 1860 it became part of the Kingdom of Italy.

The city is said to have been evangelized by Sts. Peter and Pierinus, and its first bishop was probably Gaudentius (313). A general council was held there, 1409, and a university erected, 1343. Pisa possesses a famous duomo, or cathedral, begun in 1063, beside which is the celebrated leaning tower, or campanile; and many other specimens of medieval ecclesiastical architecture. It is the seat of an archdiocese which has a Catholic population of 190,000, 750 churches and chapels, 330 secular priests, 110 regulars, 200 sisters.

Pisa, University of. In the 11th century jurisprudence and medicine were taught at Pisa, and in 1338, as Benedict XII had put Bologna under an interdict, some of the faculty and students of that university settled there. A studium generale was erected a studium generale, confirmed by Charles IV, 1355. It was closed, 1359, reopened by Urban VI, 1364, suppressed by the Florentines, 1446, and reopened again by Lorenzo de' Medici, 1473. It was restored by Cosimo de' Medici, 1543, aided by Pope Paul III with large concessions out of the Church revenues and monasteries, and became the cradle of modern science. United with the University of Sienna, 1851, the faculties of philosophy and medicine remained at Pisa. It now has the ordinary faculties with schools of engineering, agriculture, veterinary medicine, and pharmacy, and a normal high school. Among its noted scientists were Cesalpino, Galileo, Galilei, Borelli, and Marcello Malpighi. Students, 1906.—C.E.

Pisano, Andrea, or Andrea di Uccello di Nino (c. 1273-1348), sculptor and architect, b. Pisa; d. Florence. A pupil of Giovanni Pisano, he went later to Florence where he was influenced by Giotto, from whom he derived the beginnings of naturalism in his art. Having worked as a goldsmith, he was commissioned in 1330 to design the first bronze doors of the baptistery of Florence, those on the south side. Twenty of the sculptured panels show the life of John the Baptist, and in eight the Virgins are represented. Put in charge of the building of the campanile of the Duomo after the death of Giotto, he carved the majority of the lower reliefs. He designed the façade of the cathedral of Orvieto. —C.E., I, 470.

Pisano, Niccolò (c. 1307-78), earliest of great Italian sculptors, b. probably Apulia; d. Pisa. He is famous for the hexagonal pulpit of the baptistery of Pisa, a work of Gothic design, the trefoil arches and sculptured capitals, with classic influence in the figures and reliefs. Three of its columns rest on lions. The reliefs of the balustrade give scenes from the N.T. His octagonal pulpit in the cathedral of Sienna is more elaborate, but lacks the unity of the first. He designed the beautiful fountain of Perugia, and executed most of its statuettes. One of his earliest works was the "Descent from the Cross" in the tympanum of the Lucca cathedral.—C.E., XI, 47.

—Giovanni (c. 1240-1320), sculptor and architect, son of the preceding, b. Pisa; d. probably Sienna. He assisted his father at Perugia, where he completed the fountain. He designed the pulpit of San Andrea at Pistoia and that of the cathedral at Pisa, the remains of the latter being now in the museums of Pisa and Berlin. His work shows more of the French influence than his father's. His figures have the slenderness of the Indian Gothic, and his somewhat crowded reliefs show more movement.
than the classic models. As capomaestro of the cathedral of Pisa, in 1278, he designed the Campo Santo, and he is said by Vasari to have designed the façade of the Siena cathedral.

Piscina (Lat., fish-pond or basin), also called Sacarium, Thalassicicon, or Fenestrella, the baptismal font, or the cistern into which the water flows after baptism. Also an excavation about two or three ft. deep and one ft. wide, covered with a stone slab, to receive the water from the washing of the priest’s hands and the water used for washing the palls, purifiers, and corporals, also the bread crumbs, cotton, etc., after the sacred unctions, and the ashes of sacred things no longer fit for use. It is generally constructed near the altar at the south wall of the sanctuary or in the sanctuary. It is sometimes in the form of a perforated stone basin, or a small column or niche of stone or metal.—C.E.

Pisc. Charles Constantine (1801-66), priest and writer. Born in Philadelphia. He was educated at Georgetown College, Washington, entered the Society of Jesus and was ordained, 1825; the first Catholic chaplain to the U. S. Senate, 1836; and appointed librarian of the Vatican, 1869. He was a member of the Expedition of Celoron de Bienville which in 1749 explored the Ohio and Allegheny Rivers in the interest of French claims; he conducted services near or possibly within the limits of the present city. In 1754 a fort on the site of Pittsburgh was captured by the French, rebuilt, and named Fort Duquesne, and the chapel within the stockade was dedicated in honor of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin of the Beautiful River. The chaplain was Friar Denys Baron, a Recollect priest; he and the chaplains of two other forts kept a record of baptisms and burials in this region from 1753-56, and this register contains the names of some Indian converts. For some time, after the British took the fort and named it Fort Pitt, there were few Catholics in the region. In 1784 a group of Catholic families sent a messenger to Baltimore requesting that a priest be sent to them once or twice a year, and in the next few years several pioneer priests from various places visited them at irregular intervals. The first resident pastor, Fr. William F. X. O’Brien, came from Baltimore, where he had just been ordained, 1808, and founded St. Patrick’s Church; in less than three years the church was dedicated and Confirmation administered there by Bishop Egan of Philadelphia. The next church, St. Paul’s, was nearly finished by Fr. O’Brien’s successor, Fr. Charles B. Maguire, ready for dedication when the population of the city, about 20,000, included four or five thousand Catholics. The next year a Catholic school was established and in 1838 an orphan asylum. In 1839 the Redemptorists, the first community of men in Pittsburgh, undertook the care of the German-speaking residents of the city, for whom they founded and of St. Philomena. The Diocese of Pittsburgh was established in 1843 under Bp. Michael O’Connor, who had already been pastor of St. Paul’s and had established a parish school, a men’s literary society, and a reading room. As bishop he introduced religious communities of men and of women and established several parishes and institutions and a chapel for colored people. Under his direction the weekly “Catholic” was founded, 1844. In 1843 the Sisters of Mercy made at Pittsburgh their first foundation in the United States. The rapid industrial growth of the city during the 19th century brought a great increase in the number of Catholics of many nationalities, necessitating for some time the use in the churches of ten or more languages. At present the city has 81 Catholic churches, with 76 parish schools; 8 other schools and academies, including an institute for deaf mutes; Duquesne University (q.v.); 12 orphanages and homes, including 2 houses of the Good Shepherd; 3 day nurseries; 6 hospitals; Catholic churches, with 76 parish schools; 8 other schools and academies, including an institute for deaf mutes; Duquesne University (q.v.); 12 orphanages and homes, including 2 houses of the Good Shepherd; 3 day nurseries; 6 hospitals; Catholic schools and 4 churches and schools of the Diocese of Pittsburgh of the Greek Rite.

Pittsburgh, Diocese of (Greek Rite), Pennsylvania; established 1924; embraces all Greek Catholics of Russian, Hungarian (Magyar), and Croatian nationalities in the United States, wherever domiciled, and is thus not a territorial diocese. Piùs I (Lat., devout), Saint, Pope (c. 140-c. 154), b. Italy. During his pontificate, the fact that St. Justin expounded Christian teaching in Rome, and that the three heretics Valentinus, Cerdon, and Marcion visited there, prove the primacy of the see in this century. Feast, R. Cal., 11 July.—C.E.; Butler.

Piùs II (ENEA SILVIO DE' PICCOLOMINI), Pope (1458-64), b. Corsignano, Italy, 1405; d. Ancona, Italy. Enea Silvio Piccolomini was one of the foremost humanists of his age, and noted as a poet, historian, and statesman. Frederick III made him poet-laureate at his court. After a dissolute youth he entered the priesthood and labored zealously for the papacy; for his diplomatic successes he was made Bp. of Trieste, and of Siena. When elected, he continued his literary work, devoting much time to his autobiography, unique in the history of the papacy, and to his geographical history which is said to have influenced Columbus. Due to the apathy of Christian princes he labored in vain to free Europe from the Turkish domination and he died at the mustering-place of the Crusaders as he was about to lead the expedition himself.

—C.E.; Pastor.

Piùs III (FRANCESCO TODERCHI PIENCOLOMINI), Pope (1503), b. Siena, Italy, 1439; d. Rome. Abp. of Siena, cardinal-deacon, legate to Ancona and Germany, and a man of spotless character; he was elected to succeed Alexander VI. His short pontificate of 29 days left no time for the fulfillment of his policy.—C.E.; Pastor.

Piùs IV (GIOVANNI ANGELICO BRASCHI), Pope (1555-65), b. Milan, Italy, 1499; d. Rome. Before his election he was governor of many cities in the Papal States, commander of the papal troops, and cardinal. During his pontificate he continued his literary work, devoting much time to his autobiography, unique in the history of the papacy, and to his geographical history which is said to have influenced Columbus. Due to the apathy of Christian princes he labored in vain to free Europe from the Turkish domination and he died at the mustering-place of the Crusaders as he was about to lead the expedition himself.

—C.E.; Pastor.

Piùs V (MICHELLE GHISLELI), Saint, Pope (1566-72), b. Rosco, Italy, 1504; d. Rome. A Dominican and theologian, he was Bp. of Sutri, cardinal and inquisitor general for all Christendom before his election. During his pontificate he raised the standard of morality in Rome; enforced the discipline of the Council of Trent; continued the struggle against Protestantism and the Turks, whose domination of Europe ended with their defeat at Lepanto, 1571; condemned the writings of Bains; reformed the Breviary and the Missal; excommunicated Queen Elizabeth; and proclaimed the supremacy of the see in his Bull "In Censo Domini." Feast, R. Cal., 5 May.—C.E.; Butler.

Piùs VI (GIOVANNI ANGELICO BRASCHI), Pope (1775-99), b. Cesena, Italy, 1717; d. Valence, France. Before election he was papal secretary, treasurer of the Roman Church and cardinal. As pope he condemned Febronianism and journeyed to Austria to curb the anti-clerical legislation of Emperor Joseph II. After the Revolution (1775-99), Pius released the American clergy from the jurisdiction of the Vicar Apostolic in England; appointed Rev. John Carroll superior of the Mission of the Thirteen United States of North America, 1784; and erected the See of Baltimore, 1789. His papal reaction of the Civil Constitution of the French clergy caused the French to retaliate by annexing papal territory. Under Napoleon Rome was sacked and proclaimed a republic, 1798. Pius refused to submit and was borne in captivity to Valence, where he died.—C.E.

Piùs VII (BARNABA CHIARAMONTE), Pope (1800-23), b. Cesena, Italy, 1740. He was educated at the college for nobles, Ravenna, and entered the Benedictine Order, 1256. Before his elevation to the papacy he was Bp. of Tivoli, and of Imola, and cardinal. During his pontificate he erected the dioceses of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Bardstown, Charleston, Richmond, and Cincinnati in the United States; the religious question in France was settled by the Concordat of 1801; the Papal States were restored at the Congress of Vienna, 1814-15, through the efforts of Consalvi, cardinal secretary of state; the English, Scottish, and German colleges at Rome were reopened; and the Society of Jesus was reestablished for the Universal Church, 1814. Pius was held prisoner by Napoleon, 1809-14, first at Savona and later at Fontainebleau, yet pleaded with the prince-regent of England for the fallen tyrant during his imprisonment at St. Helena, 1815-21. During his reign Rome was the abode of the artists Canova, Thorwaldsen, Führich, Overbeck, Pforr, Schadow, and Cornelius.—C.E.
Pius VIII (Francesco Xaverio Castiglione), Pope (1829-30), b. Cingoli, Italy, 1761; d. Rome. He was Bp. of Monalto, and of Cesena, Card. of Frascati, and grand penitentiary. During his reign the Catholic Emancipation Bill was passed in England, 1829. He published a Brief, 1830, which declared that marriage could be blessed by the Church only when the proper promises were made as regards the education of the children. He was especially versed in canon law, numismatics, and biblical literature.—C.E.

Pius IX (Giovanni Maria Mastai-Ferretti), Pope (1846-78), b. Siniaglia, Italy, 1792; d. Rome. Prior to his election he was director of the hospital of San Michele; Abp. of Spoleto, Imola; and cardinal-priest. The nineteenth century witnessed the rise of a false liberalism in almost every nation of the world. The movement came to a climax during his long pontificate. Pius was unable to better ecclesiastical conditions in Prussia, Russia, Germany, Switzerland, Austria, Italy, and Mexico, but was successful in arranging concordats with Spain, Portugal, and the South American republics. He restored the hierarchy in England and Holland, but in Italy his efforts to stop the outrages committed in the name of progress against clergies and Church property were unsuccessful. Victor Emmanuel wrested from him all the papal dominions and in 1870 the Italian government unlawfully seized Rome, making it the capital of United Italy. The terms of the so-called Law of Guarantees, 1871, intended as a recompense, were rejected by Pius, who inaugurated the voluntary imprisonment of the popes in the Vatican, which continued until 1878, under Pius XI. In spite of these obstacles the spiritual history of the papacy is one of extensive growth during this period. The Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin was proclaimed a dogma of the Church, 1854; the philosophico-theological writings of Günther were condemned, 1837; the Encyclical “Quanta Cura” was published, 1869, accompanied by the famous “Syllabus” which reiterated the condemnation of pantheism, naturalism, socialism, communism, freemasonry, and other forms of religious liberalism; during the Vatican Council, 1870, papal infallibility was made a dogma of the Church. Among his appointees to the Sacred College were Cardinals Wiseman, Manning, Cullen, McCloskey, Diepenbrock, Geissel, Rauscher, Mathieu, and Donnet. He erected 36 sees and 10 vicariates Apostolic in the United States; and in Rome founded the Latin American College, 1853, and the College of the United States of America, 1859. The process of his beatification has been proposed.—C.E.

Pius IX, Order of, papal order of knighthood founded 17 June, 1847, by Pius IX. It comprises four classes: (1) Knights of the Great Ribbon who wear a wide dark blue silk ribbon bordered with red which extends saltire-wise from the left shoulder to the right side where the star of the order is suspended by a rosette, and on the breast a large diamond-studded badge; (2) Commanders with the Badge, who in addition to the star wear a badge of smaller design than the large plaque on the breast; (3) Commanders, who wear the decoration at the neck; (4) Knights who wear the star on the left breast. The decoration is an eight-pointed star made of blue enamel, the spaces between the rays filled with gold flames. On the white medallion in the center the name of the founder surrounded by the words “Virtuti et Merito” is engraved. The reverse side is the same save for the substitution of “Anno 1847” for Pius IX. The rarely worn official uniform consists of an elaborately embroidered dark blue evening coat, golden epaulettes, white trousers, and a bicornered white plumed hat.—C.E.; IV, 667.

Pius X (Giuseppe Melchiorre Sarto), Pope (1903-14), b. Rovere, Italy, 1835; d. Rome. Before his election he accomplished many reforms in favor of the poor, and promoted the Gregorian Chant. He was made Patriarch of Venice and cardinal in 1893. During his pontificate he published encyclicals against modernism, socialism, and the oppression of the Indians in Peru by the rubber merchants, and recommended daily Communion and the reception by all children of the age of discretion. A congregation of cardinals appointed 1904, to recodify the Canon Law succeeded in reorganizing the Curia and publishing new rules for diocesan relations. His pontificate was troubled by struggles with the European powers, especially France, Italy, Spain, and Portugal.—C.E.; Bazin, Life of Pius X, Loud., 1929.

Pius X School of Liturgical Music, founded in 1918, and established at the College of the Sacred Heart, at Manhattanville, New York City, by Justine Ward, with the help of the late Rev. J. B. Young, S.J. Pope Pius X urged that Gregorian music be restored to the people as a means of sanctification, but they could not sing nor understand a type of music so different from any thing they had ever heard. Mrs. Ward's idea was that such music be brought within the grasp of every child by teaching children to perform it with ease. The obvious field was the parochial schools. The plan was developed by training the children of the Annunciation School for Girls, taught by the Religious of the Sacred Heart, at the direction of Mother G. Stevens, and with the cooperation of teachers from the various religious orders, the School has flourished and has won for itself a unique place in art and education. Its work is divided into three departments: the training of teachers in the normal school; supervision of music in schools that have adopted the method; and extension work, which sends teachers out to give courses in schools and colleges. Two sessions a year are given, examinations are conducted on the plan of the Regents of the University of N.Y.S., and diplomas are awarded. The students are members of the teaching orders, priests, seminarians, organists, choir-masters, and pianists and singing-teachers from the laity. They teach children to read at sight, to read new melodies and analyze them in-Placidia, Galla (393-450), Queen of Rome, daughter of Theodosius the Great. In the sack of Rome by the Goths she was taken a hostage by Alaric and afterwards married Ataulf, King of the Goths. After his death she became the wife of Constantius and the mother of Valentinian III, for whom she acted as regent. Her zeal in building and beautifying churches gave a new stimulus to Christian art in the 5th century.-C.E.

Placidus and Companions, Saints, martyrs (c. 541), d. Messina, Italy. Placidus was the son of the patrician, Tertullus, and was sent when still a child to St. Benedict at Subiaco. In 529 he accompanied St. Benedict to Monte Cassino, which originally belonged to Tertullus. The legend of his later life relates that Placidus went into Italy, 541, and founded a monastery at Messina, of which he became abbot. There he was martyred with thirty companions. Feast, 5 Oct. Plagues of Egypt, ten calamities sent by God to the Egyptians to overcome the obstinacy of Pharaoh, and consequently to force him to let the children of Israel leave Egypt (Ex. 7 and 12). Of the 10 plagues 7 were directly wrought through the agency of Moses and Aaron, or of Moses alone. The 4th, 5th, and 10th were wrought directly by God. They are: (1) the water of the river and all the canals and pools of Egypt was turned into blood and became so corrupted that the Egyptians could not drink it, and the fish in the waters perished; (2) an immense number of frogs, which caused great discomfort; (3) swarms of gnats which tormented men and beasts; (4) pest of flies; (5) murrain or cattle-pest which killed only the cattle of the Egyptians; (6) epidemic of boils on man and beast; (7) hailstorm which wrought terrific havoc; (8) plague of locusts; (9) the horrible darkness which covered the earth for three days; (10) the destruction of all the firstborn of Egypt on one night.-C.E. (C. J. B.)

Plain Chant, Church music of the early Middle Ages, before the advent of polyphony, the idiomatic and most appropriate accompaniment of the liturgy.-C.E.

Plantin, Christophe (1534-89), book-binder and publisher, b. near Tours, France; d. Antwerp. In 1555 he opened at Antwerp one of the largest printing-houses in Europe. Appointed royal archi­typographer by Philip II, he printed the "Biblia Regia," also the "Index Expurgatoriuss" and obtained from Rome the privilege of printing all liturgical works. After the firm ceased to exist in 1867, the printing-house was purchased by Antwerp and converted into the Plantin-Moretus Museum.—C.E.

Platina (Saccii), Bartolomeo (1421-81), humanist, b. Piadena, Italy; d. Rome. Deprived of his membership in the College of Abbreviators by Paul
If he wrote a scathing and false account of his character in his “Vita Pontificum” (Lives of the Popes), which influenced historical opinion for centuries; this work is the first systematic handbook of papal history. In this appears the legend of regulatory and disciplinary.—C.E. (M. C. D.)

Plato (c. 427 B.C.-347), Greek philosopher, b. Athens; d. there. He came under the influence of Socrates, and their intercourse through ten years was the dominant influence in Plato’s philosophical career. His works, which took the form of dialogues, possess rare beauty of expression and the characters display marked urbanity of manner, coupled with a faculty of expressing abstract thoughts clearly and intelligibly. The Platonic idea influenced the whole system of his philosophy. In the world above us there exists justice, unmixxed with any injustice, eternal, unchangeable, and immortal—this is the Idea of Justice. Likewise in that celestial region there exist Ideas of greatness, goodness, beauty, etc., and also of concrete material objects as the Idea of man, horse, etc. When we perceive a material object in this world of our experience the mind is moved to a remembrance of this same thing which it contemplated formerly when human souls dwelt in this higher world of Ideas. The world of Ideas is the only true reality. There was much in this doctrine of Ideas that appealed to the early Christian philosophers. The emphatic affirmation of the spiritual order of reality and the fleeting nature of the things material fitted in well with the essential Christian idea of the hegemony of the spirit. To adapt Plato to Christianity, Platonists from Justin Martyr to St. Augustine contended that Plato meant that the world of Ideas exists in the mind of God. Aristotle however had leaned to the interpretation that the Ideas are self-subsisting and separate. In general they appreciated the uplifting influence of Plato’s system and recognized in it a powerful ally of the Faith of Christ in the warfare against materialism and naturalism.—C.F.; Turner, History of Philosophy, N. Y. 1903. (c. x. d.)

Pleasure (Lat., placere, please) etymologically means delight or gratification. According to St. Thomas it results from the perfection of activity, for whenever activity is perfectly exercised, pleasure is present, and is proportionately augmented as the activity becomes more perfect. Morally considered, pleasure is the satisfaction obtained from the possession of good. Hence, pleasure may vary according to the appetite considered. It is spiritual, if it resides in the will; it is sense pleasure, if it resides in the sense organs. Spiritual pleasure is morally good or bad according as the object is good or bad. Sense pleasure has its morality from the usefulness to moral good or at least its compatibility with moral good as seen by the agent. Pleasure indulged in with due regard for law is not sinful.—Cronin, Science of Ethics. (c. A. F.)

Plenary Council, a council of the archbishops and bishops of a country or region under the presidency of a legate of the Holy See which determines the matter to be discussed and ratifies the council’s decree. These decrees bind the entire country or region, only a bishop of the region having the power to dispense from them. A plenary council has no powers to define doctrine; its sphere is regulatory and disciplinary.—C.E. (M. C. D.)

Plenary Indulgence. See Indulgences.

Plinth, term in architecture for a plain, continuous surface under the base moulding of any column.

Plough Monday (Lost Monday), first Monday after the feast of the Epiphany, upon which alms were formerly offered to God for the good of the Church and to obtain a blessing on the land which was ploughed at that time.

Plumier, Charles (1646-1704), botanist, b. Marseilles, France; d. Puerto de Santa Maria, Spain. His first botanical excursion to the French Antilles resulted in his appointment as royal botanist by Louis XIV in 1693. Two other trips to Central America and the Antilles class him among the important explorers of his time. He left a unique collection of descriptions and writings on plant life.—C.E.

Pluscarnen Priory, a monastery of the Valliscuallan Order, founded, 1230, near Elgin, Scotland, by King Alexander III of Scotland. In 1434, the Benedictine rule was adopted there; in 1586, one monk survived. The confiscated property later came into the possession of John, Marquess of Bute, who translated the Breviary into English. Some of the buildings may still be seen.—C.E.

Plymouth, Diocese of, England, comprises Devonshire, Dorsetshire, Cornwall, and the Scilly Islands; suffragan of Birmingham. Bishops: George Errington (1851-55), William Vaughan (1855-1902), Charles Graham (1902-11), John Kelly (1911-28), and William Barrett (1929). Churches and chapels, 115; priests, secular, 78; priests, regular 46; elementary schools, 34; other schools, 19; institutions, 8; Catholics, 21,027.

Plymouth Brethren, a religious sect which appeared in England and Ireland early in the 19th century. The first permanent meeting was formed at Plymouth, England, 1829; hence the name Plymouth Brethren; various communities, however, call themselves Believers, Christians, Saints, or Brethren. Identified with this movement were John Nelson Darby, George Muller, Samuel Prideaux, and Anthony Norris Groves. Since there was no ecclesiastical organization, divisions arose around the different leaders. There are now six bodies of this sect. In America the divisions are "open" and "exclusive," although no one term applies to any single division. The tenets of the various bodies are in fundamental agreement. Acknowledging no creeds, they regard the Scripture as their only guide. Believing personal gifts a sufficient authorization, there is no regular ministry among the Plymouth Brethren. They have in the United States 458 churches, and 13,244 communicants.
BRETHREN II, second branch of Brethren, known as Open Brethren, who entertain a wide variety of views. PLYMOUTH BRETHREN III represent the extreme high-church principle of the Brethren, and refuse admittance to any person whose life and doctrinal views are not in agreement with the principles of Christian faith as laid down by Scripture. PLYMOUTH BRETHREN IV, result of a breach in 1890, when controversy arose regarding the subject of eternal life. They hold that there is only one Church of God and all true Christians belong to it. Christ is the head of this Church, which is His body, and which He will eventually take to heaven where it will rule with Him over the earth in what is commonly called the millennium. They are scattered throughout the Northern states of the United States, with a few in the South, and are very numerous in the British Empire. PLYMOUTH BRETHREN V, dissenters from Plymouth Brethren III, on the question of discipline. They stress the individual responsibility of members for evangelistic and philanthropic work under the guidance of Scripture. PLYMOUTH BRETHREN VI, separated from the 4th branch in 1906 over ecclesiastical matters, neither doctrine nor practise being involved.

Pneumatomachi (Gr., pneuma, spirit; macho­mat, fight), members of a 4th-century heretical sect which denied the Divinity of the Holy Spirit. See MACEDONIANISM.—C.E. (R. J. G.)

Poland, republic of Europe, west of Russia; area, including territory still claimed by Lithuania, 149,958 sq. mi.; pop. (1927), 29,589,000. It is thought that there were a few Christians, probably refugees, in Poland when in 906 Mieszko, ruler of Poland, submitted to German authority, embracing Christianity and taking under his protection missionaries from Germany and Bohemia. The first bishopric was founded at Posen, 970. Under the next ruler the Archdiocese of Gnesen was established, freeing the Polish churches from their former dependence on the hierarchy of Germany. However, most of the clergy and monks were still foreigners, and because of the persistence of paganism and the confusion and devastation of much warfare, it was some time before the Faith was established among all the people. By the 13th century a large native Polish clergy had developed and there were many convents. At this time the country was divided into several bishoprics. At this time the country was divided into several bishoprics. In Austrian Poland the Church came at first, especially in the reign of Joseph II, under harsh control of the State, and under Russian and Prussian rule Catholics were persecuted. The Russian Government attacked especially the Ruthenian Uniates, suppressing their dioceses and compelling them to break their connection with Rome. In some regions all Catholic Church lands and convents were confiscated, the clergy were placed under many restraints and were forbidden communication with Rome, and Polish schools were closed and replaced by Russian schools. The Russian Government attempted to organize a national Polish Church independent of Rome, and prelates who resisted were deported to Russia. In 1838 Abp. Martin von Dunin was imprisoned for upholding the law of the Church, against new regulations of the Prussian Government, regarding mixed marriages. The Prussian Government, having colonized much Polish territory with Germans, replacing Poles by Germans in official positions, and having made the state schools and courts German, ruled that all religious instruction in Posen be given only in German. For resistance to this demand many teachers were dismissed, and the Abp. of Gnesen and Posen, Card. Mieczyslaw Ledochowski, was imprisoned for two years and then compelled to leave the country. The Prussian Government also confiscated Church lands and convents. The independent Republic of Poland was proclaimed, 1918. It grants equal rights to all denominations. The great majority of the population are Catholic. Since 1918 many religious societies have been reestablished there, and in 1925 the churches of the Latin Rite were organized in the following dioceses, some of ancient origin but with their boundaries newly adjusted to the territory of the Republic:

Son of Sir Richard Pole and Margaret, niece of Edward IV, he was always recognized as kinsman by Henry VIII. Educated at Charterhouse and Oxford, he became dean of Wimborne collegiate church, 1518, although he had not yet taken orders. With Henry's assistance he went to Padua, 1521, where he was a favorite among scholars, knowing Erasmus and More. Returning to England, 1527, he was elected Dean of Exeter, but to avoid embarrassment after Henry's divorce, he went to Paris, only to be recalled by Henry who, crediting him with the Paris university's approbation of his divorce, offered him, on Wolsey's death, important sees. Pole, however, expressed himself unequivocally on the divorce and Henry allowed him to return to Padua. His uncompromising reply when Henry pressed him for a written defense of the king's conduct, 1534, and his courteous disobedience of the summons to England to explain were almost simultaneous with the summons to Rome, where, despite his protestations, Paul III made him, still without orders, a cardinal, 1536. In England his brothers were arrested and his mother martyred. He was one of three legates at the opening of the Council of Trent, 1542. When Paul III died he might have become pope “by adoration,” but willingly allowed it to pass. The death of Edward VI, 1553, restored him to active life in England, where, on his arrival as a metropolitan, 1559, by Whom he was elevated to the See of Smyrna. He was a bitter foe to heresy and upon his visit to Rome, 1544, where he conferred with Pope St. Anicetus, he made numerous converts. His only extant work is his reply to the Philippians. Polycarp's Acts are the earliest record of martyrdom for Christianity. The persecution of Marcus Aurelius being prevalent in the East, c. 166, Polycarp was seized and pressed to save his life, was burned and then speared. Relics in S. Ambrogio in Massina, Rome. Feast, R. Cal., 26 Jan.—C.E.; Butler; Lightfoot; Apostolic Fathers, Lond., 1889.

Polycarp: Bibles, polyglot (Gr., polya; glotta, tongue, many-tongued), are printed renditions of the text of Scripture in several languages. The oldest of these Bibles is the Computusian Polyglot (1514-17) of Cardinal Ximenes. This work exhibits printed texts of the Old Testament in Hebrew, Greek and Latin, and of the New Testament in Greek and Latin. Worthy of note also are the Ant-Polytheism (Gr., polys, many; theos, god), the belief in, and consequent worship of many gods, the religion of the ancient Assyrians, Babylonians, Hindus, etc.; also a personification of natural forces or phenomena in the mythology of Greece and Rome.—C.E.; Windle, Religions Past and Present, N. Y., 1927.

Ponce, pön-thä, Diocese of, Porto Rico; est., 1924; comprises the south and west portions of the Island of Porto Rico, and is immediately subject to the Holy See; area, 1800 sq. m. Bishop: Edwin Vincent Byrne (1925). Churches, 38; chapels, 56; priests, 65; religious women, 143; colleges, 5; parochial schools, 6; institutions, 11; Catholics, 650,000.

Pondicherry, Archdiocese of, India; Vicariate Apostolic of Coromandel Coast, 1836; Archdiocese of Pondicherry, 1886; bounded e. by the Bay of Bengal; n. by the River Pular; w. partly by the River Chunar, and partly by the River Kumbakonam; includes also the smaller outlying French possessions: Karikal and Yanam on the east coast, Mahé on the west coast, and Chandernagore in Bengal; suffragans: Coimbatore, Murbad, Nilambur, and Trichinopoly. Churches, 38; chapels, 50; priests, 94; religious women, 143; colleges, 5; parochial schools, 6; institutions, 11; Catholics, 650,000.

Pontificals (Lat., pontificalis, things pertaining to a bishop), marks of dignity used by cardinals when celebrating with full pontifical solemnity; also, at Mass only, by abbots in their monasteries and by some privileged prothonotaries Apostolic, and canons. The pontificals common to all are eight in number: buskins, sandals, gloves, dalmatic, tunicle, ring, pectoral cross, and mitre. Among the pontificals not common to all are the crosier, gremial, pallium, and archiepiscopal processional cross.—C.E. (J. C. T.)

Pontifical College, a seminary for the education of future bishops, especially of the United States. It was incorporated by a Papal bull in 1853; and was erected into a college in 1870. It is a connection of the pontifical bishopric of Rome, and receives its endowment from the Papal States.

Pontifical College Josephinum at Columbus, Ohio.—C.E.

Pontifical Mass, the solemn Mass celebrated by a bishop with the prescribed episcopal ceremonies; the full ceremonial is carried out when the bishop celebrates as the head of his own cathedral, or with permission in another diocese. It is also the solemn Mass celebrated in St. Peter's by the pope.—C.E.; Fortescue, The Mass, N. Y., 1914. (C. J. B.)

Pontificals (Lat., pontificalis, things pertaining to a bishop), marks of dignity used by cardinals and bishops at Mass and other offices of the Church when celebrating with full pontifical solemnity; also, at Mass only, by abbots in their monasteries and by some privileged prothonotaries Apostolic, and canons. The pontificals common to all are eight in number: buskins, sandals, gloves, dalmatic, tunicle, ring, pectoral cross, and mitre. Among the pontificals not common to all are the crosier, gremial, pallium, and archiepiscopal processional cross.—C.E. (J. C. T.)

Pontifical Society of the Holy Childhood, an international organization which interests Catholic children in the temporal and spiritual salvation of children of pagan parents in all parts of the world; founded by Abbé Forbin-Janson in Paris, 1833, after having spent some time of his enforced exile from France in visiting the then new missions in China. The wholesale abandonment of baby girls, practised in many Chinese districts, inspired him to save many such souls through the apostolate of the children of his own country. He began a crusade among the French schools and soon gathered sufficient funds to enable the first group of Sisters of Charity to set out for China, where the first refuge was established, 1845. During a second period of exile, spent in England with the Leicestershire family of Ambrose Philips De Lisle, at Grace Dieu Manor, Cal., 19 Nov.—C.E.; Butler.

Pontifex Maximus, a title of the pope. The Latin word pontifex is of obscure etymology; it may be derived from: (1) pons (bridge) and facere (to make), a bridge-builder, or possibly one who offered sacrifice on the sacred Sublician bridge; (2) pompa (a solemn procession) and facere; (3) pontis (Oscan-Umbrian, propitiatory offering) and facere. The term was used in Roman antiquity to designate the head of the principal college of priests, and was also the translation of the Hebrew term signifying "high priest." Roman emperors added it to their titles until the reign of Theodosius. At present the title is applied to the pope as head of the hierarchy.

Pontifical Colleges. (1) Those colleges which have explicitly received the honorary title Pontifical. (2) Those which have been created only in a general way, because they are directly dependent upon a central authority at Rome. The three institutions of the first class are: The Pontifical Seminary of Kandy, Ceylon; The Pontifical Seminary of Scutari; The Pontifical College Josephinum at Columbus, Ohio.—C.E.

Pontificale (Pontificale Romanum), a liturgical book divided into three parts, containing the instructions and prayers for episcopal functions, outside of Holy Mass; also for the sacramental ceremonies, consagrations, personal, local, and real blessings, and for acts of jurisdiction. Such ceremonies of bishops developed in the 10-11th century, from the Sacramentaries and "Ordines Romani"; such collections were known as the "Liber Pontificalis," or "Ordinarium Episcopi." The first Roman Pontifical was published at Rome, 1485.—C.E. (D. R.)

factions of the society are now applied to practically every ecclesiastical superior in the mission field, especially in China, Japan, India, Central and South Africa, among the aborigines of Australia, and the Indians of North and South America. The society claims to have been instrumental in securing the baptism of at least twenty-five million children; in establishing thousands of homes and nurseries, and numberless Christian families and communities; and in fostering the vocations of hundreds of native priests and sisters. It publishes a quarterly "The Annals of the Holy Childhood." In his Encyclical on missions issued, February, 1926, Pius XI singled out the society for special commendation as the children's work for foreign missions. The word "Pontifical" is a prefix only recently authorized.—C.E., VII, 399. (E. v. w.)

Pont. Max. = Pontifex Maximus (Supreme Pontiff).

Pontus, pōnt-us (Gr., the sea), in ancient times, a N.E. province of Asia Minor, a long and narrow strip of land on the s. coast of the Black Sea. Christianity was introduced here in Apostolic times, the First Epistle of Peter being addressed to the Christians in Pontus, and others (1 Peter, 1); inhabitants of this province were present at Pentecost (Acts, 2).—C.E.

Pools in Scripture. In Palestine, where dry weather prevails 8 months of the year and springs are not abundant, the supply of water, especially in cities and towns, was assured by means of reservoirs either made by damming up a narrow valley or excavated from the rock (Heb. be'erekah). Although practically every town had its pool, yet those that were in the neighborhood of Jerusalem are mentioned much more frequently. They were: (1) the Lower or Old Pool (Birket el-Hamra) s. of the old city, origi-Poor Clares (Poor Ladies, Sisters of St. Clare), the Second Order of St. Francis, founded, 1212, at the convent of San Damiano, Assisi, by St. Clare, under the direction of St. Francis, who charged the community to live according to the gospel counsels. Following the example of St. Clare, groups of women banded together in various monasteries of the mendicant order organized by Innocent III along nearly identical lines with the Waldenses with the hope that the latter would be thus more easily won back to the Church and to combat the current heresies, especially the Albigensian. They were formed of a group of reconciled Waldenses and religious mendicant order organized, 1208, to reunite the Waldenses with the Church and to combat the current heresies, especially the Albigensian. They were formed of a group of reconciled Waldenses and were organized by Innocent III along nearly identical lines with the Waldenses with the hope that the latter would be thus more easily won back to the Church. The organization spread through Southern France and Spain and founded a school at Milan, 1209. After 1212, however, they began to disintegrate, for they had retained, along with their former customs and habits, some of their heretical tendencies. In the provinces of Narbonne and Tarragona they were united with the Preaching Friars of St. Dominic and the Friars Minor of St. Francis by order of Gregory IX, 1227, and in Milan, by order of Innocent IV, they were incorporated into the Augustinian Hermits, 1256.—C.E.

every member of the Church may have recourse to him, as in appeals in ecclesiastical cases, without prohibitive charges or other hindrance. This implies control of every department of the life of the Church: of the faith and the formulas thereof, or Creeds; of the means and methods of imparting religious instruction by books or in schools; of Catholic missions; the foundation of universities and of special institutes and colleges; the condemnation of heresies; the interpretation of the moral law; the prohibition of books injurious to faith or morals. Worship too comes under papal control, the regulation of liturgical services, designation of feasts, canonizations, indulgences, all that concerns the sacredness of the marriage bond, special powers to priests, on occasion, to confirm, or bless holy oils. He can legislate for the entire Church, summon general councils, grant dispensation from any ecclesiastical law, interpret, alter, abrogate any law made by himself or his predecessors. He constitutes new sees, alters the boundaries of those in existence, appoints bishops, approves religious orders and exempts them when need be from diocesan control. All this is done by aid of devout and experienced assistants and advisers, the various tasks being distributed among various congregations or committees, eleven in number, each superintended by one of the cardinals. The present pope is, according to that most reliable list, the 261st. Pope's exercise of power absolutist or arbitrary. Besides the check of his own conscience, he is guided by the spirit, practice, and tradition of the Church, its ancient statutes, customs, and precedents, its council; in a word, by strict consistency with its past and by a pious regard for its pastors and the faithful. The pope has also power to be entitled Vicar of Christ, Head of the Church, Father of all the faithful, Supreme or Sovereign Pontiff, His Holiness, Servant of the Servants of God, the Fisher, after the calling of the Apostles and their designation by Christ as fishers of men. He wears the tiara, or triple crown. He ranks as first of Christian princes, and his ambassadors have precedence over other members of the diplomatic body. The office of the pope brings him into contact with civil rulers and legislatures insomuch as they may regulate temporal affairs affecting religion; there are now 31 countries represented at the Vatican. He must superintend the administration of the Vatican State, as formerly his predecessors had to administer the States of the Church. He is constantly sought after by men of affairs, scholars, sociologists. His bishops visit him at regular intervals, visits ad limina, as they are called; priests engaged in special missions must have access to him; no head of a state is more accessible by audiences which are granted to men and women of all faiths, and of every rank. The pope is elected by votes of the College of Cardinals in a session known as the Conclave, two-thirds of those voting being the necessary majority. Strictly speaking, any male Catholic might be elected, but the choice usually falls to one of the cardinals. The present pope is, according to the most reliable list, the 218th.

stantly tends to outstrip the means of livelihood, subsistence can be increased only in arithmetical ratio, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5. As a result, he said, the food supply exercises certain checks on the increase of population. This application of the theory is known as neo-Malthusianism. Other applications of the theory are the population theories of the Socialist and evolutionary schools. The basic assumption of the Malthusian theory, i.e., that the reproductive powers of man exceed his power of increasing his food supply, has been proved false by experience. Since Malthus's time the means of subsistence have more than kept pace with the growth of popu­ lization. Furthermore, the theory mistakes a potential tendency for an actual reality. It declares that what is mathematically possible is certain and unavoidable. Finally, it ignores the great counteracting agencies emphasized by Catholic economists, namely, choral living, the effective organization of production, and the equitable distribution of goods.—C.E.;

Porter (Ostler, Lat. ostium, a door), the first of the minor orders, by which spiritual power is conferred on the recipient, of opening and closing the doors of the Church, and of guarding the Temple of God.—C.E.

Portiuncula (Lat., dim. of portio, a portion; a small part). (1) The church in Assisi where in 1206 St. Francis of Assisi recognized his vocation, and where he made his abode until his death in 1226. Originally a very small edifice, the church has been gradually enlarged through the centuries.

(2) Portiuncula Indulgence. An indulgence which may be gained in any church so designated by the bishop, by all the faithful who after Confession and Holy Communion, visit such churches between the noon of Aug. 1 and midnight of Aug. 2, or on the Sunday following. The indulgence is totes quoties and is applicable to the souls in Purgatory.—C.E.

Portland, Diocese of, Maine; comprises the State; area, 33,040 sq. m.; suffragan of Boston. Bishops: David W. Bacon (1855-74); James Augustine Healy (1875-1900); William Cardinal O'Connell (1901-06); Louis S. Walsh (1906-24); John Gregory Murray (1925). Churches, 188; stations and chapels, 136; priests, secular, 178; priests, regular, 19; religious women, 679; academies, 10; parochial schools, 53; pupils in parochial schools, 25,293; institutions, 20; Catholics, 182,599.

Portland in Oregon, Archdiocese of, Oregon; vicariate Apostolic, 1843; archdiocese, 1846 (name changed, 1928, from Oregon City to Portland in Oregon); comprises that part of Oregon west of the counties of Hood River, Wasco, Jefferson, Deschutes and Klamath; area, 21,398 sq. m.; suffragans: Baker City, Boise, Great Falls, Helena, Seattle, Spokane and the Vicariate-Apostolic of Alaska. Bishops: Francis Norbert Blanchet (1845-80); Charles John Seghers (1880-84); William H. Gross, C.SS.R. (1885-98); Alexander Christie (1899-1925); Edward D. Howard (1926). Churches, 145; priests, secular, 83; priests, regular, 94; religious women, 792; colleges, 2; seminary, 1; academies, 19; high school, 1; parochial schools, 52; pupils in parochial schools, 7202; institutions, 12; Catholics, 43,559.

Port Louis, Diocese of, Mauritius Island (British possession, east of the Isle of Madagascar); comprises Mauritius Island; directly subject to the Holy See; entrusted to the Fathers of the Holy Ghost; established 1847. Bishops: Peter A. O'Neil O.S.B. (1896-1911); James R. Bilsborrow, O.S.B. (1911-16; afterward Abp. of Cardiff); John B. Murphy (1917-25); James Leen, C.S.SP. (1926). Churches, 32; priests, regular, 36; schools, 67; pupils, 13,780; Catholics, 129,000.

Port of Spain, Archdiocese of, Island of Trinidad, B.W.I.; diocese, 1820; archdiocese, 1850; includes the Islands of Trinidad, Tobago, Grenada, the Grenadines, St. Vincent, and St. Lucia; suffragan: Roseau, in Trinidad, B.W.I. Bishops: James Buckley, Mgr. McDonell, Richard Smith, Vincent Spaccapietra, Ferdinand English, J. L. Gonin, O.P., John P. Dowling, O.P., (1907). Churches, 70; priests, secular, 15; priests, regular, 75; communities of religious women, 4; Catholic schools, 150; Catholics, 193,000.

Porto Rico, dependency of the United States, in the West Indies, administered by a governor appointed by the President of the United States and a local legislature; area, 3,455 sq. m.; est. pop., 1,422,000. The Diocese of San Juan, Porto Rico, was created 8 Aug., 1511; the first church was erected at Caparra that same year, and the Convent of St. Thomas Aquinas, the first religious community in Porto Rico, was established, 1629. During the Spanish domination of the island, the Church was under royal patronage and the civil and religious authorities were intimately associated. On the assumption by the United States of control over Porto Rico, 1898, full justice and every consideration was granted by the new government which even went to the extent of paying $300,000 for the church property confiscated by Spain. Great missionary work has been done by the Augustinians, Carmelites, Capuchins, Dominicans, Vincentians, and Redemptorists, from the United States. Schools are conducted by Srs. of Mercy from Albany, Dominican Srs. from Brooklyn, Servants of the Most Blessed Trinity from Alabama, and Srs. of Charity, Porto Rico included in 1929 the dioceses of San Juan and Ponce (qq.v.) with 93 churches, 50 secular priests, 115 regular priests, 9 universities and colleges, 1 seminar, 8 high schools, 17 primary schools, 25 charitable institutions; Catholic population, 1,125,000.—C.E.

Port-Royal, pör-rwə-yəl, a Benedictine abbey for women, founded by Mathilde de Garlande, 1204, located at Chevreuse, near Versailles. It later came under the rule of Cîteaux, and after its reformation by Mother Angélique Arnauld, 1609, became a center and fortress of Jansenism. In 1626 the community repaired to Paris where it founded Port-Royal of Paris, assuming the name of Daughters of the Blessed Sacrament. Here the Abbé St-Cyran, spiritual director of the monastery, gathered around him a group of priests and laymen known as "Solitaires," who became leaders of the Jansenist movement. In 1638 they left Paris and established a community near the old abbey "of the Fields" where some of the nuns later repaired; there was thus a Port-Royal of Paris and a Port-Royal "of the Fields." The famous "Little Schools" were opened, and, since the community included some remarkable men, and admirable teachers, it came to exert a profound influence on the religious and literary life of France in the 17th century, and contributed substantially to the progress of pedagogy. Among them were Nicole, Le Nain de Tillemon, Lemaître de Lacy: their most illustrious pupil was Racine, Pascal was one of their followers, and they enlisted the sympathies of Bossuet and of Mme. de Sévigné.

Their prestige enabled them to resist, for a long time, the authority of both the king and the pope, but in 1704 they were suppressed by a Bull of Clement IX. Louis XIV, who hated Port-Royal, gave the order to expel the nuns, 1709, and in 1710 the buildings were razed; only the tower and some ruins of the once magnificent monastery now remain. The buildings of Port-Royal of Paris still exist and are occupied by a maternity hospital.—C.E.; Sainte Beuve, Port-Royal, Paris, 1840. (F. p. r.)

Portsmouth, Diocese of, England, comprises Hampshire, the Isle of Wight, Berkshire, and the Channel Islands; suffragan of Westminster. Bishops: John Vertue (1882-1900), John Cahill (1900-10), and William Conolly: churches and chapels, 174; priests, secular, 90; priests, regular, 152; elementary schools, 51; other schools, 35; institutions, 11; Catholics about 33,247.

Portugal, republic, Europe; area, 35,490 sq. m.; pop., 6,002,991. Christianity was introduced there during the Roman domination. Alfonso Henríques, first King of Portugal (1128-85) offered his kingdom to the Church, placing it under the Blessed Virgin's protection; he founded, among others, the famous Cistercian monastery of Alcoabaça. From 1185 to 1260 the Crown and the Holy See were in frequent conflict over the rights of the clergy. During this period, the Dominicans and Franciscans made foundations in Portugal. King Denis, 1279, brought peace by restoring church properties and former rights and customs, and by prohibiting abuses by the laity, but the Church's position was weakened by the long struggle, as the clergy thus became more dependent on the monarch. Portugal remained loyal to Urban VI in the Great Schism owing to the firmness of the bishops. Only a few of the 33 grievances drawn up by the clergy at the Cortes of Elvas were adjusted. The Diocese of Ceuta, 1417, was the first see erected in a non-Christian country evangelized by the Portuguese. Communication between Portugal and Rome was closed after the battle of Alvarroela, 1451, but reopened, 1452. Gradually the number of synods decreased, and ecclesiastical discipline declined. Many important sees were occupied by non-resident noblemen, who had to be ordered by brief, 1501, to comply with their neglected duty of visitation. Dominican and Franciscan reforms instituted at this time spread rapidly; 23 Observants' convents were established within the century. The Inquisition was introduced into Portugal by John III, 1547. The Jesuits devoted themselves, from their arrival, 1540, to erecting schools and colleges at home and to the missions in Asia and Africa. The period 1580-1640, when the crowns of Spain and Portugal were united, was a disastrous time for the Church. Although Portugal lost most of her eastern possessions, her missions there continued. The Marquis of Pombal, minister to King Joseph, 1750-77, expelled the Jesuits and the papal nuncio, destroyed the foreign missions. After the Revolution of 1820, the Liberals suppressed all men's orders, prohibited orders of women from taking novices, confiscated Church property, and bound clergy and hierarchy to the state. By decree, 1901, religious orders were permitted to teach school and convert pagans. Religious institutes were founded by Bene dictines, Franciscans, Missionaries of the Holy Spirit, Irish Dominicans, Little Sisters of the Poor, Sisters of the Third Order of St. Dominic, Franciscan Sisters, Servites, Dorotheans, Sisters of the Missions, Salesians, Sisters of St. John of God, Sisters of St. Joseph of Cluny, Marists, Sisters of St. Vincent de Paul, and Portuguese Sisters of Charity.

With the establishing of the republic, Church and State were entirely separated. There is now absolute freedom of worship in Portugal; the predominant faith is the Catholic. Circles of Catholic workmen have been organized and the associations of Catholic youth deserve mention. For Portuguese possessions in India, see INDO-PORTUGUESE. Portugal in 1829 included the following ecclesiastical divisions:

- Braga, A. 1733
- Braganza, D. 1754
- Coimbra, D. 583
- Lamego, D. 430

PORTUGUESE PONTIFICAL COLLEGE, Rome, founded, 1000, by Leo XIII. Its direction is entrusted to Italian secular priests and the students attend lectures at S. Apollinaire.

PORT VICTORIA, Diocese of. Mahé Archipelago, east of Africa; comprises the Seychelles Islands (Mahé Archipelago) in the Indian Ocean (British possession); directly subject to the Holy See; pre­texture, 1852; vicariate, 1880; diocese, 1892; en­trusted to the Capuchins. Bishop Clark preceded George J. Lachavanne (1906-20) who was succeeded by Louis Guny, O.M. Cap. (1921). Churches, 21; stations, 12; priests, 15; schools, 19; pupils, 1988; Catholics, 18,151.

PORT VICTORIA AND PALLERSTON, Diocese of. See NORTHERN TERRITORY, PREFECTURE APOTOLIC OF.

POSITIVISM, the system of Auguste Comte (1798-1857), in its affirmative aspect making knowledge and truth identical with sense experience. Hence physical science, with sociology at its head, and the aim of all thinking should be classification of facts according to its method. In its negative aspect it denies the validity of all supra-sensual knowledge, rejecting metaphysics and philosophy; we know relations, not causes, and a fortiori not the First Cause (See AUGUSTINIANISM). Mankind has progressed from the theological through the metaphysical to the positive stage. Denying the knowability of a Personal God, Comte worshiped humanity, and made sociology his sacred science—C.E.; Turner, History of Philosophy, N. Y., 1903.

POSLANIEC SW. FRANCISKA, a monthly magazine published in the Polish language in Pulaski, Wis., at the Franciscan Monastery, for the members of the Third Order of St. Francis; founded 1915; circulation, 5620.

POSTCOMMUNION (Lat., post, after; communio, communion), part of the Proper of the Mass, a petition chanted or said by the celebrant at the Epistle side of the altar after the communion antiphon, usually combining an act of thanksgiving for the holy mysteries, and a plea for the graces they bring—C.E.

POSTULANT (Lat., postulare, ask), in the strict sense, one who is taking the first step in the religious life, before having received the habit. Broadly speaking, a person who aspires to religious life but has not yet been admitted into any particular order, such as a pupil of an Apostolic school, or one who having decided to enter the religious state remains as a guest in a monastery while waiting admission—C.E.

POSTULATION (Lat., postulare, to ask). It may happen that the electors to an office regard a certain person as more fitted for the office than others, but there stands in the way of his being elected a canonical impediment, from which a dispensation can and is usually granted; in that case the electors can by their votes postulate his appointment from the competent superior. The Code of Canon Law treats of this method of appointment (can. 179-182).—C.E.; P. C. Augustine. (J. Maco.)

Pouget, Jean Francois Albert du, Marquis de Nadaillac (1817-1904), anthropologist and chevalier of the Legion of Honor, b. Rougemont, Cloyes, France; d. there. He was prefect of Basses-Pyrenees and Indre-et-Loire, but later devoted himself to paleontology and anthropology, and became an authority on cave drawings. His best-known works are “Prehistoric America,” “The First Population of Europe,” and “The Decline of the Birth-rate in France.”—C.E.

Pound, a piece of money mentioned in Luke, 19. Its value was equal to the sixtieth part of a talent (Attic), and according to the Roman gold standard was worth about $20.

Pounds, Parable of the, delivered by Our Lord on His last journey to Jerusalem, on the occasion of His meeting with Zachaeus, the publican (Luke, 19). In it He showed that the business of His kingdom consisted in leading all men to the perception and fulfillment of the will of God, thus bringing to all of them not temporal riches, but eternal salvation. A nobleman, before setting out on a journey to receive a kingdom, called ten of his servants and divided ten pounds among them, charging them to trade with them until his return. His fellow-citizens, hating him, sent an embassy to prevent his receiving the kingdom, but the brief signifies in words of Our Lord show how fruitless were their efforts, “And it came to pass that he returned, having received the kingdom, and he commanded his servants to be called.” In their accounts of the use of the pounds the similarity of this parable to that of the Five Talents (q.v.) is quite marked. The parable ends with the punishment of the citizens who opposed the prince, prefiguring the fate of Israel. In the nobleman who returned as king we recognize Christ, Who at His Ascension took His seat at the right hand of His Father, and Who will return to bring His earthly kingdom to a glorious conclusion. The thrifty servants represent the faithful members of His kingdom.—Fowck, tr. Leaby, Parables of the Gospels, N. Y., 1915; Olivier, tr. Leaby, Lond., 1927.

Poussin, pô-so-sâ, Nicolas (1594-1666), painter, b. Villers, near Rouen, France; d. Rome. After several attempts as a young artist to reach Rome, he finally succeeded in 1624, and the study of antiquity developed the devotion to classic ideals that characterizes all his work. Choosing subjects from mythology and the Old Testament he attained such fame by 1639 that he was invited to the French court by Louis XIII. The jealousy of rival painters influenced his return to Rome, where he remained till his death. His landscapes are a notable part of his work. The Louvre has many of his canvases, among them “The Finding of Moses,” “Eliezer and Rebecca,” and “The Blind Men of Jericho.” Other works are “The Rape of the Sabines,” “The Childhood of Jupiter,” “Moses Striking the Rock,” and the set called “The Seven Sacraments.”—C.F.

Poverty (Lat., paupertas, poverty; O.F., povrte, indigence). In Catholic doctrine and asceticism, poverty is one of the three Evangelical Counsels. Taken as such, it indicates the voluntary renunciation, partial or complete, of the right of ownership either by an individual, religious or laic, or by an entire religious community or order (Mendicant Orders). It involves at the same time the moral obligation to use the goods of earth after the manner of the ordinary poor. Apart from this specific significance, poverty means in general any deficiency in what is desired or desirable or in what constitutes richness. More particularly, it denotes the scarcity or absence of the means of subsistence, or the state of those who suffer the lack of such means. As understood by economists and sociologists, poverty is that economic and social status in which a person, either because of inadequate income or of unwise expenditure, lacks some of the requisites of physical efficiency, that is, normal health and productive capacity; or, to formulate a definition substantially equivalent in meaning to the economic and utilitarian conception, but more in consonance with the dignity of man, it is that more or less chronic condition in which a person for whatever reason falls short of the sum total of material goods requisite for the development and maintenance of normal health and strength, of an elementary amount of comfort, of a minimum degree of culture, and of right moral living.—C.E.; Gillin, Poverty and Dependency, N. Y., 1925; Nearing, Poverty and Riches, Phila., 1916.

Pouget, Jean Francois Albert du, Marquis de Nadaillac (1817-1904), anthropologist and chevalier of the Legion of Honor, b. Rougemont, Cloyes, France; d. there. He was prefect of Basses-Pyrenees and Indre-et-Loire, but later devoted himself to paleontology and anthropology, and became an authority on cave drawings. His best-known works are “Prehistoric America,” “The First Population of Europe,” and “The Decline of the Birth-rate in France.”—C.E. of heaven. This means that he would have universal, independent, and supreme jurisdiction over the Church.—C.E.; VIII, 631. (C. D. Mcl.)

Powers, those angels who compose the lowest choir of the second or intermediate order of angels (q.v.). Their distinguishing note is a special power or efficacy in restraining the attacks of the evil spirits. (A. J. S.)

Powers of Evil, Since original sin is ascribed to the instigation of the devil: “By the envy of the devil, death came into the world” (Wis. 2), and according to S. Paul (Eph., 6), the evil spirits are the most dangerous enemies of our souls, the real powers of evil in the world are the fallen angels. Hence, if a man living in sin, are said to be slaves, or in the power, of Satan; and other evils so-called, such as calamities, sickness, and the like, are often due to the same powers of evil. (B. S.)

Pozzo, PÖTzo (PUTEUS), Andreas (1642-1709), painter and architect, b. Trent; d. Vienna. He studied painting in early youth, and entering the Society of Jesus as a lay-brother at twenty-four, devoted his life to the decoration chiefly of churches of the Society. His sense of perspective made him especially successful in fresco work on ceiling and dome, as in the church of San Ignazio in Rome. Other examples are in the church of San Bartolomeo at Modena, and the Cassinese Abbey at Arezzo. In architecture he was essentially Baroque, and in the elaborate altars of the Gesù in Rome and Gli Scalzi in Venice. One of his admired paintings is the “St. Francis Borgia” in the Gesù.—C.E.

Præclare custos virginum, or BLEST GUARDIAN OF ALL VIRGIN SOULS, hymn for Matins on 8 Dec., expressly mentioning the papal court, so that no edicts of the kings of France and Spain. The following are the best known among these decrees: (1) The Sanctio Pragmatica, said to have been issued by St. Louis IX of France in 1269, dealing adversely with a papal fiscal and appointative powers in France. (2) The Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges, 1438, issued by Charles VII of France, adversely with the papal fiscal and appointative powers in France. The name is also given to some famous subjects to plead in a foreign court in matters of religion, the lifting up of mind and heart to the instigation of the devil: “By the envy of the devil, death came into the world” (Wis. 2), and according to S. Paul (Eph., 6), the evil spirits are the most dangerous enemies of our souls, the real powers of evil in the world are the fallen angels. Hence, if a man living in sin, are said to be slaves, or in the power, of Satan; and other evils so-called, such as calamities, sickness, and the like, are often due to the same powers of evil. (B. S.)

Præmunire (Lat., to place before), statute of Edward III of England, in 1353, forbidding his subjects to plead in a foreign court in matters which the King’s Court could decide, and in 1365 expressly mentioning the papal court, so that no bishop, priest, or layman could appeal to it. (m. n.)

Pragmatic Sanction (Lat., sanctio pragmatica, decree on public affairs), an edict formally issued by the emperor, in the later period of the Roman Empire. The name is also given to some famous subjects to plead in a foreign court in matters of religion, the lifting up of mind and heart to the instigation of the devil: “By the envy of the devil, death came into the world” (Wis. 2), and according to S. Paul (Eph., 6), the evil spirits are the most dangerous enemies of our souls, the real powers of evil in the world are the fallen angels. Hence, if a man living in sin, are said to be slaves, or in the power, of Satan; and other evils so-called, such as calamities, sickness, and the like, are often due to the same powers of evil. (B. S.)

Prazed, SAINT, virgin (d. Rome, 164). According to legend she was the daughter of St. Pudent and sister of St. Pudentiana. She employed her wealth in the interest of the Church and was renowned for her virtues. Represented holding a basin in one hand, branches in the other. Relics in her titular church, Rome. Feast, Oct. 21. July.

Pray and give, (Lat., precari, to beg), an act of the virtue of religion, the lifting up of mind and heart to God to adore, praise, thank Him, and ask Him for aid, an implied exercise of faith, hope, and, at least, initial love. Vocal prayer is the recitation of a set form; mental prayer is interior, made without the use of a given formula. Prayer is necessary for salvation, the victory over temptation, the practise of virtue, the perseverance in grace. It is the ever possible and ready means of grace prescribed by God as the acknowledgment of God’s sovereignty, and man’s utter dependence on Him. Prayer which man makes for himself will certainly be heard, if the proper things are asked, and the prayer is made with attention (excluding wilful distractions), sincerity, humility, confidence, perseverance. Private prayer is that made in one’s own name; public prayer is made in the name of the community. Liturgical prayer is the official prayer of the Church (prayer of the Mass, the Litany). The spirit of prayer consists in the appreciation of the excellence, the conviction of necessity, and confidence in the power of prayer. The most perfect prayer is the “Our Father.”—C.E.; Fisher, A Treatise on Prayer, Lond., 1885; Poulain, tr. Smith, The Graces of Interior Prayer, St. L., 1911.
Prayer of Christ, Feast of the, occurred the Tuesday after Septuagesima, in commemoration of Our Lord's agony of prayer at Gethsemani; it is no longer on the calendar.—C.E.

Prayers (in the Divine Office), a series of verses and responses recited at the Canonical Hours on certain days of the year. These prayers represent a form of liturgical prayer, and in substance go back to Apostolic times, when they found place at Vespers and Lauds. The prayers are of two classes: (1) dominical, recited at Prime and Complin on certain Sundays and minor feasts; (2) ferial, recited at all the Hours, except Matins on vigils and ferias of Lent and Advent. (J. O. X.)

Prayer of the Dead benefit the souls in Purgatory but cannot benefit the just in heaven or the damned in hell. The councils of Florence and of Trent, voicing the constant teaching and practice of the Church, have expressly declared that the souls in Purgatory are aided by the suffrages of the faithful. They are aided especially by the Mass (Trent, Sess. xvi), indulgences, and by good works, such as prayers, alms, fasting, etc. These good works are applied by way of satisfaction, i.e., the satisfactory value of good works, which consists in the remission of punishment due to sin, is transferred to the poor souls. To apply the satisfactory merit to the dead the state of sanctifying grace is necessary for those works and their effects ex opere operantis, not, however, for those producing their effects ex opere operato, as the Mass, and prayers offered in the name of the Church. It is reasonable to hold that God always applies the satisfactory merits of good works, offered for the dead, to the poor souls; almost always to those souls for whom they are offered; not always, however, according to their full value, but in accordance with His justice, wisdom, and goodness.—C.E., IV, 653; Pohle-Preuss, Eschatology, St. L., 1924.

Preacher (Heb., Q(1)ohleth; Gr., ekklæsiastes, translated in the Vulgate as Ecclesiastes (q.v.), as a personal title refers to Solomon, the Son of David, King of Jerusalem, regarded as a herald of Divine wisdom proclaiming truths on the proper estimate of earthly things. Many have seen herein an indication that the wise though voluptuous king returned to God before his death. (7. M. C.)

Preacher Apostolic, a dignitary of the pontifical household whose duty it is to preach to the assembled papal court four times during Advent, and weekly during Lent. It was established as a permanent office by Paul IV in 1555, and conferred on the Capuchin Order by Benedict XIV in 1753. The present preacher apostolic is the Most Rev. Fr. Victorius a Sestri Ponente, O.M.Cap.—C.E.

Preaching, or Homiletics, in the strict and only true sense of the term, implies public discoursing on a religious subject by one having authority to do so. Preaching, therefore, can be applied only to the public religious discourses given by bishops or priests of the Catholic Church. Preaching began with Our Lord Himself, who preached very frequently, and entrusted the continuation of the work to the Apostles. Sacred Scripture speaks very frequently, and very forcibly, about the necessity and great importance of preaching the word of God. When Our Lord invested the Apostles with the "power of teaching," He placed one of the three essential elements for the institution of the Catholic Church. Christ by giving to the Apostles (and to their successors) the threefold power of ruling, teaching, and sanctifying, instituted His (the Catholic) Church. He gave this power to the Apostles in the following words: "Going therefore, teach ye all nations; baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and lo, I am with you all days, even to the consummation of the world" (Matt., 28). The Apostles looked upon preaching as a positive duty, "For if I preach not the gospel, it is no glory to me, for a necessity lieth upon me; for woe is unto me if I preach not the gospel" (1 Cor., 9). It is the chief part of the bishop's office and that of priests likewise. Faith is the beginning, the foundation of the spiritual life; but faith comes by the grace of God through hearing sermons: "For whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved. How then shall they call on Him, in whom they have not believed? Or how shall they believe, whom they have not heard? And how shall they hear, without a preacher? And how shall they preach unless they be sent, as it is written: How beautiful are the feet of them that preach the Gospel of peace, of them that bring glad tidings of good things!" (Rom., 10).

Cardinal Gibbons says, "So essential to the preservation of Christianity is the ministry of preaching, that if the voice of the Evangelist were hushed in a district or city for fifty years, the light of the gospel would well-nigh be extinguished in that region." Over and above the qualifications to be found in every speaker, the one chosen for the special office of preaching should: (a) possess a vocation to the holy priesthood; (b) be a man of virtuous life, since he is called upon to preach all the virtues; (c) be a man of prayer; (d) be well versed in the Sacred Sciences. As in every discourse, so in preaching, the proximate end to be attained is the persuading of the hearers to take those good resolutions which the preacher, by his argumentation, has convinced them they ought to take. It is one thing to convince a man that he should take or abstain from something, another to persuade him to take it. He who best knows how to combine the two qualities, convincing and persuading, in their proper proportion, is without doubt the best and most effective preacher. The remote end to be attained is the salvation of souls. A very important consideration in preaching is the remote preparation which consists in: (a) formation of a good style; (b) a judicious course of reading; (c) collection of useful and striking matter; (d) practice of composition. The Council of Trent laid down many important regulations, to be observed by the clergy in their duty of preaching the word of God. The New Code (c. 1327-52) gives the complete law of the Church on preaching in a very clear and satisfactory manner. Perhaps the most important document on this subject in recent Christian religion is the means divinely employed that the preaching of the wisdom taught us by the Word of God, by Benedict XV (June 15, 1917) 782. "Wherefore since by God's good pleasure, things are preserved through the same causes by which they were brought into being, it is evident that the preaching of the wisdom taught us by the Christian religion is the means divinely employed to continue the work of eternal salvation, and that it must with just reason be looked upon as a matter of the greatest and most momentous concern. ..."—C.E., VII, 443; Manning, Eternal Priesthood, Lond., 1884; Boyle, Instructions on Preaching, N. Y., 1902. (R. J. M.)

Prebend, the right of a member of a chapter of canons to his share in the revenues accruing to the church. In order to assure the decent maintenance of the canons, the Code decrees that in closed chapters there should be as many canons or prebendaries as there are prebends; in chapters which have no fixed number of members, there may be as many as in the bishop's judgment, after consulting the chapter, can be properly supported from the revenues. Should these revenues prove insufficient, the bishop may use certain means of supplying what is wanted (canon 394). In a wider acceptance, the term, prebend is any part of the revenues set aside for the clergy attached to the church, even though not members of a chapter.—C.E.; P. C. Augustine. (W. J. M.)

Precaria (Lat., preces, petition), a claim, in the form of a letter, to a benefice promised but not vacant, for which the expectant had to wait until such preferment became vacant. Abuses caused the Council of Trent to limit them; the Code of Canon Law does not acknowledge them. (C.A.)

Precedence (Lat., procedere, to go before), superiority of rank. Canonical precedence is determined for individuals by: (1) authority of one person over another; (2) higher rank in the hierarchy of jurisdiction; (3) higher rank in the hierarchy of orders; (4) priority of promotion to the same rank of jurisdiction or orders; (5) seniority of age. Where it is not a question merely of individuals the precedence is as follows: the secular clergy, the religious clergy, the religious of a non-clerical society, the laity. The place of honor is at the end of processions.—C.E. (J. C. W.)

Precentor (Lat., pra, before; canere, to sing), an official in choir service ordinarily ranking second in dignity, who presided over the chanting of the office, or in general for liturgical functions. Frequently he had various other duties in cathedral and collegiate chapters.—C.E.

Precept (Lat., præciper, to command), a certain command given directly, not to a community, but to individuals. Precept is used in many different senses. Sometimes it designates a common generic concept of two specific terms, law and mere precept. Law is in a certain sense a precept, as for example when we say: "The natural law has many precepts each one of which properly and formally partakes of the nature of law." Again by precept something is meant foreign to the comprehension of law. Law proceeds from a public official. The father of a family may impose precepts on his children, but since he is not a public official, he cannot make a law. Law and precept although frequently used to designate the same thing are different. (1) They differ by reason of their end, since the end of law is common good, and the end of precept is private good, yet it too may be for public good, e.g., a superior may forbid one to visit a certain house, first, because of danger to such person of spiritual ruin, second, also to prevent scandal. Precept given directly is for the individual good, to prevent scandal is for public good. (2) They differ by reason of the one commanding, for a law maker is a public person; one giving a precept may be a private person enjoying domestic power. (3) They differ by reason of subject. Law is imposed on each individual, even on those not yet born, in so far as in the future they will be part of the community. Precepts are imposed directly on private persons, and they are imposed for the present only. (4) They differ by reason of extension. Law obliges in the territory for which it was enacted; precepts affect and follow the individual. (5) They differ by reason of subject. "Law does not acknowledge, them. Counsel is optional. Good as referred to divine goodness, is of varying standards. Certain kinds of good are necessary to an attainment of divine goodness and hence are of the nature of a precept; others are conducive to greater perfection and are of the nature of counsel. The evangelical counsels are so called because they are especially recommended in the Gospel. Poverty, chastity, and obedience dispose one to perfection.—C.E.; Slater, A Manual of Moral Theology, N. Y., 1909; Brin, Scholastic Philosophy; P. C. Augustine. (J. J. M.)

Precepts, Affirmative and Negative. Affirmative precepts enjoin acts to be performed; such as, "Remember to keep holy the Sabbath Day." Negative precepts forbid the placing of acts; as, "Thou shalt not commit adultery." Still, not the phraseology but the concept must determine the affirmative or negative nature of a precept. Affirmative precepts contain the positive will of the legislator, whereas negative precepts prohibit acts in themselves intrinsically wrong irrespective of positive legislation. Despite this clear-cut distinction it is difficult in some isolated cases to determine whether a precept is affirmative or negative. "Thou shalt not steal" is a case in point. Precepts, both affirmative and negative, urge at all times, but with this difference: negative precepts urge always and at every instant, since always and at every instant the prohibited act is to be omitted; but affirmative precepts urge always but not at every instant, since the enjoined act is always enjoined but not to be performed at every instant. Affirmative precepts sometimes yield to excusing causes, but not even fear of death will excuse from the negative precepts of the Divine Law. (H. A. S.)

Precious Blood, the Blood of Our Saviour, shed for the redemption of mankind, mentioned repeatedly in the N.T. Since the Council of Trent theologians generally hold that it was an essential part of the Sacred Humanity and consequently hypostatically united to the Second Person of the Blessed Trinity and therefore an object of adoration. Although special honor was bestowed upon it by the Apostles and Fathers and many saints, yet a feast in its honor was not celebrated till the beginning of the 19th century, when Bl. Gaspare del Buffalo obtained permission to have it celebrated in the Missionary Society of the Precious Blood. Pope Pius IX extended the feast to the entire Church in 1849, assigning it to the first Sunday of July. Pope Pius X changed it to the first day of July. To some places a second celebration of the feast has been granted for the Friday after the fourth Sunday of Lent. There has been an archconfraternity of the Precious Blood since 1815.

—C.E.

Preconization (Lat., praeconizare, to publish), the solemn proclamation of a new bishop's appointment, made by the pope in Consistory. Formerly all episcopal appointments made by the pope were first announced in Consistory, being consistorial affairs. Today, however, such appointments are often made outside Consistory, but they must later be given solemn proclamation in Consistory, and this preconization, rather than the former appointment determines the precedence among bishops.—C.E.

Precular (Lat., precare, to pray), one bound by the condition of some benefaction to pray steadily for the beneficiaries; a bedesan. (C. J. D.)

Precursor, THE (Lat., praen., before; cursor, runner), herald, announcer, title of St. John the Baptist.

Predella, the floor of the platform on which an altar stands, or, sometimes, the upper one of the step-like shelves on the back of the altar table. (J. C. T.)

Predestination (Lat., prædestinare, to determine beforehand). In its widest sense, predestination coincides with Divine Providence and God's government of the world. Guided by His infallible prescience of the future, God from eternity foreordained the events that occur in time, and thus destined all things beforehand to their appointed end. In its strict and theological sense, predestination signifies the supernatural providence of God, immutably decreeing and efficaciously promoting the eternal salvation of rational creatures. It implies two essential elements: God's infallible foreknowledge (præscientia) of the future, and His immutable decree (decretum) of eternal happiness. God sincerely wills all rational creatures to be saved, and to that end He provides them with means at least remotely sufficient for the attainment of eternal salvation; yet He does not predetermine every one to life eternal, but only those in whom He sees fulfilled the unutterable conditions laid down by Himself. "For whom He foreknew, he also predestined to be made conformable to the image of his Son" (Rom., 8). These only are His elect, and of them no one is ever lost (John, 10). In its full or adequate meaning, predestination refers to both grace and glory as a whole, and in this sense it is defined by St. Thomas as "the fore-ordination of grace in the present, and of glory in the future." It not only includes a divine election to glory as the end, but also to grace as the means, the vocation to faith, justification, and final perseverance inseparably connected with a happy death. It is with this adequate predestination that the real dogma of eternal election is exclusively concerned. Predestination is objectively certain and immutable; but without a special revelation to that effect, no one in this life can know for certain whether he is among the predestined (Trent, sess. vi. c. 12). Hence the admonition of St. Peter: "Wherefore, brethren, labour the more, that by good works you may make sure your calling and election" (2 Peter, 1).—C.E.

Preface (Lat., praefatio, an introduction), the prayer preceding the Canon of the Mass, beginning with the words "Sursum corda," and ending with the prayer "Sanctus, sanctus," etc. This is an introduction to the Canon of the Mass and it is essentially a prayer of thanksgiving for the benefits of God. It is the first part of the Eucharistic prayers.—C.E.; O'Brien, History of the Mass, N. Y., 1882.

Prefect Apostolic (Lat., prefectus, overseer), a priest with special and stable faculties of jurisdiction in foro externo over a district in mission countries and other lands, where the hierarchy is not established. He is subject to the Holy See only. He enjoys the same rights and faculties in his respective territory as a resident bishop in his diocese, excepting the right of conferring major orders.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine. (n. d.)

Prejudice (Lat., praec, before; judicium, judgment), judgment based on wrong or insufficient data. It is that state of mind which decides on a matter either without due knowledge, or, what is worse, with erroneous knowledge. Prejudice acts in two ways: it causes its victims to judge persons or things wrongly, and, moreover, blinds their reasoning faculties so that they are not open to conviction. An illustration of this may be seen in parties opposed to each other in litigation. Neither side sees the case in the light of the other; hence the necessity of a judge. Prejudice is culpable if one does not use ordinary honesty and effort in order to know the facts of the matter in question. (M. J. A.)

Prelate (Lat., praepatus, the preferred). Originally the word was applied to bishops who ruled the Church by Divine right. Apart from this usage we have a prelate nullius, who presides over the clergy and people of a certain territory, which does not belong to any diocese. Some abbots, although not bishops, are called prelates, and have the jurisdiction of a prelate nullius, e.g., the Abbey of Einsiedeln, Switzerland. In exempt religious orders, all superiors having an ordinary jurisdiction rank as prelates, as are vicars, guardians, and priors. —C.E.; P.C. Augustine. (n. d.)

Prelature Nullius, a territory belonging to no diocese, but having its own superior, called a pre-ate, and its own clergy, and people. If such a territory consists of at least three parishes, the prelate set over it enjoys a jurisdiction and has obligations quite similar to those of residential bishops. There are many in Brazil.

Premaur, Joseph Henri Marie de (1606-1736), missionary and Sinologist, b. Cherbourg, France; d. Macao, China. He entered the Society of Jesus, 1693, and went to China in 1698 and labored as missionary in Kwang-si and after his banishment, in Macao. A deep student of the language and literature of China, he undertook to explain the rules and usage of the vulgar Chinese language and the style of the written literary language and to translate some Chinese literature. He thought he discovered in Chinese religious books and in the classics called "King" suggestions of Christian doctrines and allusions to the mysteries of Christianity.—C.E.

Premonstratensians. See Order of Canons Regular of Prémontrée.

Presanctified, Mass of the, the Mass celebrated on Good Friday in which the celebrant receives in Consecration a Host previously consecrated or sanctified. Strictly it is not a Mass, but a Communion for the priest. The form of the Mass is gone through to a certain extent but the important words of consecration are entirely omitted. The Host is elevated after the Pater Noster.—Gueranger, tr. Shepherd, The Liturgical Year: Passiontide and Holy Week, Lond., 1886.

Presbyter (Gr., presbyteros, elder), in the early Church, member of a college which advised the bishop, who was himself called a presbyter; this group formed the presbytery, the governing body of the community. Outside of this presbytery, a presbyter had no official duties as an individual. He could, however, be commissioned and deputed by the congregation to perform duties much like those of a priest, as baptizing, preaching, celebrating Mass, etc. As a member of the college, administering jurisdiction and discipline, the presbyter had to be of blameless life, and had to do his duty unmindful of human respect. They were usually men of advanced age, and like bishop and deacon were chosen by the congregation. The presbyter was above that of a deacon and below that of a bishop; they were called co-presbyters of the bishop. Irenreus tells that at an earlier date the name of presbyter was a title of honor borne by worthy and prominent men in the congregation. He also mentions the name of presbyters in connection with that of bishops in such a manner that we can infer that at some time the bishop held a position not higher than the other members of the college. In the early congregations there was a three-fold organization: the spiritual, the administrative, and the patriarchal. The last consisted of leaders and of led, the former being the elder and the latter the younger members of the congregation. Out of this distinction there arose a further separation which resulted in the development of a ruling college, or presbytery.

Presbyterian Church in the United States, a group of Southern Presbyterians belonging to the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, who, because of dissensions over the slavery question, organized at Augusta, Ga., in Dec., 1861, as the "General Association of the Presbyterian Church in the Confederate States of America." In 1864 they adopted the present name. They are strictly Calvinistic in doctrine, adhering firmly to the standards. The principal distinctive feature of their government is "the recognition of ruling elders as entitled to deliver the charge in the installation of a pastor and to serve as moderators of any of the higher courts." Four periodicals are published by them. Foreign missionary work is carried on in Africa, Brazil, China, Cuba, Japan, Korea, and Mexico. In 1916 there were 55 stations, with 642 outstations; 377 missionaries, with 894 native helpers; 100 churches, with 38,169 members; and 556 schools, with 23,600 pupils. In the United States, in 1926 there were 2195 ministers, 3591 churches, and 457,003 communicants.

Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, the first Presbyterian churches in America were established in Virginia, New England, Maryland, and Delaware as early as 1611, one of the first being on Long Island. The churches are distinctly Calvinistic in doctrine. The Westminster Confession of Faith and the Larger and Shorter Catechisms, adopted in 1729, are the standards of doctrine. Amendments to the COnfession and Larger Catechism, expressing the American doctrine of the independence of the church and of religious opinion from control by the state, were approved in 1788. The ecclesiastical organization of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. "has as its two principal factors the ministers as representatives of Christ and the ruling elders as the representatives of the people." In 1916 foreign missionary work was carried on in 26 missions: China, 7; India, 3; Persia, Siam, and Brazil, 2 each; and Africa, Japan, Korea, Mexico, Philippine Islands, Chile, Colombia, Venezuela, Guatemala, and Syria, 1 each. In 1925 in the United States there were 9829 ministers, 9401 churches, and 1,828,016 communicants.

Presbyterianism, a system of Church government originating with John Calvin (1509-64), the Genevan reformer. Its basic theory is the parity of all clergymen, holding that the "elder" (presbyteros) and "bishop" (episcopos) are the same. It does not admit, however, of congregational independence, but provides a definite gradation of government. The session governs the congregation; the presbytery, the synod, and the general assembly each holding jurisdiction over the other in the order named. Deacons and ruling elders (who are laymen) are chosen by the congregation, but the election of a teaching elder or pastor must be confirmed by the presbytery. In theology Presbyterianism has accepted Calvinism, but of late there is a tendency to modify the rigors of that system, and modernism has made severe inroads among its adherents. An invariable form of worship is used by Presbyterians, though books of worship have been drawn up as guides and adopted by some congregations. In general the sermon, with extempore prayers and hymns (often metrical versions of the Psalms) form the norm of service. Presbyterianism is the established religion of Scotland, and its strength elsewhere is largely among those of Scottish descent. There are also large numbers of Presbyterians among the Irish of Ulster and a considerable Presbyterian body in England. The first organized Presbytery in the United States was that of Philadelphia, organized in 1706. John Witherspoon, the only clerical signer of the Declaration of Independence, was a Presbyterian. A considerable missionary and benevolent work is carried on by Presbyterians both at home and abroad. Presbyterianism is divided into a number of separate bodies, differing slightly in details of doctrine or worship. The Presbyterian and Reformed Churches, having essentially the same creedal basis and similar ecclesiastical organization, for purposes of fellowship and conference have organized a World Alliance, including the following bodies: Associate Reformed Presbyterian Synod; Associate Synod of North America (Associate Presbyterian Church); Colored Cumberland Presbyterian Church; Cumberland Presbyterian Church; Presbyterian Church in the United States; Presbyterian Church in the United States of America; Reformed Presbyterian Church, General Synod; Reformed Presbyterian Church (Old School); and the United Presbyterian Church of North America. Throughout the world there are from 5 to 6 million Presbyterians and in 1926 in the United States there were 14,434 ministers, 14,848 churches, and 2,625,284 communicants.—C.E.

Presbytery. (1) In the early Church, the senate of the bishop who assisted in the rule of the diocese (1). In general, the residence of the clergy—(2) That section of the Church which is set aside for the exclusive use of the clergy. It is separated from the rest of the church by means of a railing, and is also elevated above the rest of the church. It is now known as the sanctuary. The laity are not allowed to be present in the presbytery during functions unless specially summoned, e.g., those prescribed by the rubrics on simple and semi-double feasts. (3) In modern times, the residence of the clergy.—C.E.

Prescribed Prayer. (1) In general, special prayers to be said at Mass in addition to the regular Collect of the Mass, when rubries permit, e.g., those prescribed by the pope or bishop for a special cause (oratio imperata) as, for instance, prayer for the pope during his jubilee year, a prayer in time of persecution; those prescribed by the rubrics on simple and semi-double feasts. (2) Prayers prescribed for the faithful for the gaining of indulgences, benefits, etc. (C. J. M.)

Prescription (Lat., pres, before; scribere, to write; legal sense, limitation), a legal method in both ecclesiastical and civil law of acquiring ownership and liberating oneself from burdens; hence division into acquisitive and liberating prescription. Common good demands that the possession of property should not remain uncertain and exposed to constant litigation, hence the legal institution of prescription. Certain conditions are necessary: the person must be capable of having dominion over the object claimed, for certain things are not prescribable, e.g., rights and obligations of natural or Divine law, things deputed to public use. Actual possession is necessary which must be continual; public so that the one against whom the prescription proceeds can easily know it; pacific, not taken by force or been the object of litigation; certain and not dubious. The possessor must have a title to the thing and be in good faith during the entire time of prescription. Time must also be considered; 100 years are required for prescription relative to the Holy See; 30 years relative to any other ecclesiastical corporation; civil law is to be followed relative to private persons. In American and English law, lands or movables cannot be claimed by prescription. There is special legislation regarding prescription of judicial processes.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine.

Presence of God, the. Everywhere, according to reason and faith, God is actually present, else He would be neither infinitely perfect nor changeable of change. In all creatures He is present, that is, He is with them, as a cause is present in its effects. By His essence which they imitate He gives them being, by His power with which they cooperate He gives them motion, by His providence which rules them all, He directs their actions to achieve His glory and their good (St. Thomas, Summa Theol., I, Q. 8, a. 3). In intelligent creatures God may be present as an object of thought and will. He also causes these actions by a special working and dwelling of the Holy Ghost. The presence of God in mystical contemplation is this special indwelling which the soul perceives by direct consciousness or experimentally (Poulain, tr. Smith, The Graces of Interior Prayer, St. L., 1911). The Beatific Vision is the final and perfect degree of the presence of God in the creature and of the creature's consciousness of this (Nicholas of Cusa, tr. Salter, The Vision of God, N. Y., 1928). In the Human Nature of Jesus Christ, the presence of God in creatures reaches all possible perfection. In this Human Nature, by virtue of the Spiritual Union, God the Son is present as the Person, the ultimate Subject of the actions of that Human Nature. The Real Presence of Jesus in the Blessed Sacrament is the existence of Christ's Body and Blood, Soul and Divinity wherever there are the appearances of consecrated Bread and Wine. The frequent remembrance of the Presence of God is especially His ordinary presence and His presence by grace, is a traditionally fruitful religious practise.—C.E.; Devine, A Manual of Mystical Theology, N. Y., 1903; Pohle-Preuss, God: His Knowability, Essence, and Attributes, St. L., 1921. (H. B. Mck.)

Presentation, Right of, the right that one enjoys of nominating or presenting a cleric to a vacant church or beneice. It is one of the privileges involved in the right of patronage, which may be conferred upon those who endow the church or benefice. To present a cleric, however, does not mean to install him in the office. This belongs exclusively to the ecclesiastical superior, who must accept the nominee if canonically fit.—C.E.

Presentation of the Blessed Virgin Mary, Feast of the, 21 Nov., commemorating the presentation of the Blessed Virgin as a child in the Temple where, according to tradition, she was educated. The feast originated in the Orient probably about the 7th century and is found in the constitution of Manuel Comnenus (1166) as a recognized festival. It was introduced into the Western Church in the 14th century, abolished by Pope Pius V, but reestablished by Sixtus V, 1585. Its observance by the Society of the Sacred Heart of Jesus as the day of their origin led to the devotion of Mater Admirabilis.—C.E.

Presentation of Mary (In Art). Among the many masters who have represented this subject are: Alberti, Fra Bartolommeo, Biagio, Agostino, Carracci, Cima da Conegliano, Cossa, Holbein the Elder, Palma, Piombo, Tintoretto and Titian.

Presentation of Our Lord (In Art). Among the many masters who have represented this subject are: Bellini, Borgognone, Carpaccio, Cima da Conegliano, Correggio, Dürer, Master of Liesborn, Master William of Cologne, Rembrandt, and Veit.

Prester John, name of a legendary Eastern priest and king. The fabulous wealth of this head of a supposed Christian kingdom in the Far East furnished abundant material for writers of the Middle Ages, e.g., Sir John Mandeville, now considered unreliable, and Wolfram von Eschenbach (in "Parzival"). According to Marco Polo, Prester John was Une-Khan, and for centuries that Prince of the Keria, a Mongolian tribe, was believed to be Prester John of the legend; his sacredotal character was considered due to the fact that he might have been dedicated to the priesthood in the cradle according to the Nestorian custom. In Jerusalem, early in the 15th century, there discovered that century, for the kingdom and for the king himself, along the coast of Africa and the East Indies.—C.E.

Presumption, as a capital vice, the desire to undertake what is above one's capacity. It is a consequence of pride which makes one overestimate one's abilities and blinds one to one's deficiencies. It leads one to expect graces and favors without doing anything to obtain them, and even when acting as to deserve the contrary, as when one does evil presuming that forgiveness is assured.—C.E.

Previous Marriage, Impediment of. See Lega-men.

Pride, the inordinate love of our own pre-eminence. This love becomes inordinate if it blinds us to the truth that our good qualities come from God and that others have similar or even greater gifts, and if it begets a spirit of independence which is impatient of subjection to any authority, human or Divine, and leads to a depreciation and contempt of others.—C.E.

Priester-Dieu, prè-dyu (Fr., literally, pray God), kneeling-bench used in many churches in Europe but intended primarily for use at private devotions. It received its present form in the 17th century and now resembles a wooden desk with a sloping shelf for books and a kneeling-bench attached.

Priest (Gr., presbyteros, elder, presbyter), a sacred minister who, by the sacrament of Orders, receives power to offer the Eucharistic sacrifice, to administer the sacraments, to preach, and to bless. In the exercise of his office he is dependent on his ecclesiastical superior from whom he receives jurisdiction to forgive sins and to take care of souls. It is of faith that the priesthood was instituted by Christ; also that it is a sacrament impressing an indelible character on the soul.—C.E.

Priest, Assistant, minister highest in dignity who attends bishops and certain privileged prelates in pontifical functions.—C.E.

Priesthood, the state of life of the priest; the body of the priesthood; the priestly character. See HOLY ORDERS, (ED.)

Priesthood, Levitical, institution founded by God when He chose Aaron and his sons to minister to Him in the sanctuary (Ex. 29). The essential notion of the Levitical priesthood was that of mediator between God and man (Joel, 2). The original duties of the priests were the following: to offer the daily sacrifice in the court of the Tabernacle or Temple (Ex., 29; 3 Kings, 8); to sprinkle the blood of the victims on the altar (Lev., 1); to turn the victims on the altar (Lev., 1); to renew the loaves of proposition every Sabbath (Lev., 24); to offer incense morning and evening (Ex., 30); to supply the lamps in the sanctuary with oil every day (Ex., 27); to burn the victims on the altar (Lev., 14); to inspect the lepers (Lev., 14); to purify women after childbirth (Lev., 12); to teach and interpret the Law to the people (Lev., 10); to pray for the people (Lev., 5).—C.E., XII, 407; Edersheim, The Temple.
tance assigned to the duty of visiting sick brethren, affording them both material aid and spiritual comfort, and administering to them the sacraments. The three most important confraternities of priests are the Apostolic Union, the Priests' Eucharistic League, and the Priests' Communion League.

Priests' Communion League, association of priests founded at Rome, 1906, under the Fathers of the Blessed Sacrament, and elevated to an arch-confraternity by Pius X. Its purpose is to spread the practise of frequent and daily Communion among the faithful. The requirements for entering the league are to have one's name inscribed on the register of the league; to pledge oneself to promote the habit of frequent Communion; and to subscribe for the magazine “Emmanuel” edited by the Fathers of the Blessed Sacrament. Special privileges and indulgences are enjoyed by the members of this association, and persons confessing to priests in the league may gain a weekly plenary indulgence provided they communicate very often.

Priests' Eucharistic League, association of priests established in Paris by the Venerable Pierre Julien Eymard, founder of the Congregation of the Blessed Sacrament. In 1857 he wished to attract the clergy to a more intimate and constant intercourse with Our Lord in the Blessed Sacrament. His plan matured and the association assumed its present form in 1879, received the approval of Leo XIII in 1881, and was canonically erected by Cardinal Paschini in the Church of St. Claudio. Its primary object is the frequent and prolonged worship of the Blessed Sacrament by priests. They must spend one hour a week in adoration, and persons confessing to priests in the league may gain a weekly plenary indulgence. Members of the congregation may belong to the Latin or to the Greek Rite. Statistics (approximately): 15 houses; 110 fathers; 60 lay brothers.

Priests of the Sacred Heart of Jesus (or St. Quentin), congregation of priests founded at St. Quentin, France, 1877, by Canon Leo Dehon, to offer to the Sacred Heart a worship of love and atonement by lives of zeal and piety. They devote themselves to teaching, missions, and the evangelization of natives of Africa and America. The mother-house, originally at St. Quentin, is now in Rome. Statistics: 951 religious, including 438 priests, 247 scholastics, 268 lay brothers, 148 novices; 4 provinces, 47 houses in Europe, and charge of the vicariates Apostolic of Finland and Stanley Falls, the prefectures Apostolic of Bengkulu, Funabiki, and Gariep, and missions in Brazil, Canada, the United States, Norway, Sweden, and Denmark.

Primacy, supreme episcopal jurisdiction of the pope, enunciated as follows by the Vatican Council: “We teach and declare ... that the Primacy of jurisdiction in the entire Church of God was immediately and directly promised and conferred upon the Blessed Apostle Peter by Christ the Lord” (sess. 4, cons. 1: De Eccl. Christi). The Scriptural proofs for the Primacy of Peter and for the Divine origin of the papacy are the same, viz., the Petrine texts: “thou art Peter; and upon this rock I will build my church,” etc. (Matt., 16); “I have prayed for thee, that thy faith fail not,” etc. (Luke, 22); “Feed my lambs ...Feed my sheep” (John, 21). By these words Christ endowed the papacy with all powers necessary to promote the unity of the Church. The incumbent of the office was designated supreme legislator, judge, ruler, and teacher. Primacy of jurisdiction implies that all legislative and coercive governing power is vested, in its plenitude, in one person. It is more than primacy of honor (first among equals), or primacy of order (right to preside over and direct an assembly, e.g., as Speaker of the House), or primacy of responsibility (duty of inspection, as in the opinion of Anglicans in the Conversations of Malines). By Divine institution the Primacy is perpetual; i.e., by the will of God, St. Peter will always have a successor, in such a manner that he can be recognized as such. Temporary vacancy, or obscurity regarding the person, does not destroy continuity of succession. The Roman Pontiff is the recognized legitimate successor of St. Peter.—Hunter, Dogmatic Theology, Vol. I, N. Y., 1912; Berry, The Church of Christ, St. L., 1927. (n. m.)

Prima-Primaria. The Sodality of the Blessed Virgin Mary was founded at Rome in the Roman College of the Society of Jesus, 1563, by John Leunis, for personal perfection in virtue and study, and works of charity and zeal for souls. In 1569 the older members formed a separate sodality with the title Primary Sodality (Prima-Primaria) of the Annunciation. This sodality receives persons of both sexes, every age, and every walk in life, and has branches throughout the world.—C.E., XIV, 128.

Primate (Lat., primus, first), a bishop exercising authority not only in his own province but over several provinces, as a rule over a national territory. Their authority extended to convoking and presiding over national councils, hearing appeals from the decisions of metropolitans, crowning the sovereign. Their authority was never established by canon law. The title today is one of honor only. The Abps. of Armagh and Dublin are the only prelates who have this title in English-speaking countries.—C.E. (Ed.)

Prime (Lat., primus, first), the first of the day hours of the Divine Office, so called because it was recited at the first hour after sunrise, or about 6 A.M. It is a monastic institution of the 4th century which gradually became of universal observance. It comprises hymn, three psalms, little chapter, responsory, martyrlogy, brief lessons, and prayers invoking God's help for the day. Occasionally the Athanasian Creed and ferial prayers are added.—C.E. (z. g. k.)

Primer, ordinary English prayer-book of the laity from the 13th to the 16th century, containing the Little Office of Our Lady, Vespers, certain psalms, etc. It was often prefaced by the alphabet and used to teach children to read.—C.E.

Primitive Baptists, group of Baptist associations which arose c. 1835 and have never organized as a denomination. Other names applied to them are "Old School," "Regular," "Anti-Mission," and "Hard-Shell." They are opposed to all human religious institutions and are strongly Calvinistic in their doctrine. They hold strictly to the full verbal inspiration of the Old and New Testament Scriptures, and believe that "every sane human being is accountable for all his thoughts, words, and actions." They are congregational in government. In 1925 in the United States there were 1480 ministers, 2500 churches, and 99,000 communicants.

Primo die, quo Trinitas, or HAIL DAY! WHERE-ON THE ONE IN THREE, hymn for Matins from the Octave of the Epiphany until the first Sunday of Lent, and from the Sunday nearest 1 October until Advent. It was written by St. Gregory the Great (540-604) and has about 20 translations; the English title given is by J. Neale and others. —Britt. came to signify coadjutor to the abbot (prior clausuratus), or independent superior of a monastic house having a prior (prior conventualis); and where a monastic establishment is a dependency of an abbey, the prior is obedientiary (prior obedientiarius, or prior simplex). Some orders (as the Carmelites, the Servites, and the Augustinian Hermits) have three grades of prior, the conventual, the provincial, and the prior general.—C.E.

Priorress (L.L., priorissa, fem. of prior), superior of a monastic community for women. Her office, in general, corresponds to that of prior in the same order of men.—C.E.

Priory, a monastery having a prior for superior. A conventual priory is an autonomous house having no abbot; a simple or obedientiary priory is a dependency of an abbey. In England, monasteries attached to cathedral churches were termed cathedral priories.—C.E.

Priory (as a Diocesan Organization). Only one exists today, viz., Ciudad Real, in Spain (pop., 430,565), founded, 1875, and ruled by a prior, who is always titular Bp. of Dora.

Prisca (Priscilla), Saint, virgin, martyr. Since the 7th century the grave of a martyr Prisca has been venerated in the Roman catacomb of Priscilla on the Via Salaria. There still exists on the Aventine Hill a church of St. Prisca, on the site of the "Titulus Priscæ," mentioned in the 5th century and built probably in the 4th. It is assumed that Prisca founded this title church or gave the use of part of her house which occupied this spot, for the Christian church services. An unhistorical legend relates the martyrdom of a Prisca who was beheaded on the Via Ostiensis, and whose body Pope Eutychianus is said to have translated to the church of Prisca on the Aventine. Relics in the church of St. Prisca. Feast, R. Cal., 18 Jan.—C.E.; Butler.

Priscillianism, a heresy which was introduced into Spain towards the end of the 4th century by an Egyptian named Marcus. The system was based on the Gnostic-Manichean doctrine of a two-fold principle of the world, one good, the other bad, and derived its name from Priscillian, who became the leader of the sect. Gradually assuming the form of a secret society and threatened to overrun the whole of southern Europe. Its peculiar doctrines and practices were examined at the synod of Saragossa, 380, and Priscillian and his followers were excommunicated. After Emperor Maximus, a synod was called at Bordeaux, 384. Priscillian was accused of practising magic, and he and several followers were condemned and executed while many others were exiled. The whole procedure was condemned by such men as St. Ambrose, St. Martin of Tours, and Pope Damasus. The heresy gradually died out at the end of the 6th century.—C.E. (q. v.)

Prisons, places of involuntary detention. In ancient Jerusalem there were three prisons, in Athens two, and in Rome one, the Mamertine. In the first centuries the accused and convicted of both sexes mingled. The Church became interested in prisons when innocent Christians were persecuted. Deacons and deaconesses were ordered to bring them food, clothing, and the comforts of religion. The Council of Nicea (325) and the Synod of Orleans (549) ordered deacons to visit culprits, to administer to their religious needs, and to care for their temporal wants. In the 4th century it was a practice and a duty of bishops to intercede for criminals, and by substituting voluntary penance to convert them, and to restore them amended to the state and repentant to God. Culprits naturally sought and, by consent of Emperor Constantine and his successors, found asylum in the Church. At the prayers of the bishops the emperor pardoned all lesser culprits at Easter (indulgentia paschalis). From the 3rd to the 7th century the Church had no prisons, nor did the punishment of death. In 1774 John Howard visited the main prisons of England and described their horror, while he praised the prisons of the pope as models. Europe and America gradually followed Howard's suggestion of reforms. In the United States a national and Pennsylvania or separate system, in New York the Auburn or silent system, in Elmira the classification system, which were soon imitated to some degree in other states. In England and other European countries appeared the progressive system, which allowed prisoners to merit better treatment and a reduction of their time; while in Belgium the much praised cellular system developed. Out of England's progressive system grew the conditional liberation or parole system, and this led to the systematic care of liberated prisoners. As a preventive, the probation system was developed; in some places this employs the Big Brothers and Big Sisters. National and international prison reform associations convened and suggested improved methods. Since Goring has disproved Lombroso's statement that there is a definite criminal type, study of individuals is recommended; while prisons should deter from crime they should also aim to reform criminals. Religion theoretically is acknowl-
PRISONS

Prisons, Ecclesiastical, were of the same character as those of the civil government, since the Church was considered equal to the State, and claimed for her clergy an independent jurisdiction, then generally acknowledged. At first, criminal clergies were detained in monasteries; but later diocesan prisons were established, as an English synod in 1201 prescribed. The Holy Office had its own prison. Monasteries had their prison cells, still to be seen in some of the convents. Sometimes fasting was added to imprisonment. Incarceration was chiefly inflicted on incorrigible delinquents to prevent further harm and to bring them to repentance. The Code mentions only detention in a house of penance (can. 2301).—C.E. (C. A.)

Private Baptism, that administered in danger of death, by anyone. If administered by a lay person, only the essentials for validity are to be employed (see Lay Baptism). If by a priest or deacon, the prescribed ritual also must be employed and at least one sponsor if possible. Apart from danger of death, the bishop is not to permit private Baptism, but for non-Catholic adults conditionally, but properly baptized.—Ayrinhac, Legislation on Sacraments in the New Code of Canon Law, N. Y., 1924; P.C. Augustine. (F. V. B.)

Private Judgment, one of the foremost characteristics of Protestantism, i.e., the claim that every man is competent to settle for himself the meaning of Scripture, as well as what he is bound to do in life and morals. Against this the teachings of the Council of Trent declared, and the Vatican Council reaffirmed, that "that is to be regarded as the true sense of the Sacred Scriptures, which Holy Mother Church has held and holds... and no one may interpret that Holy Scripture contrary to that sense." Against the claim of private judgment the Church holds that since she, under the guidance of the Holy Ghost, settled the canon of Scripture, and since the Scriptures are committed to her charge, she is the only lawful interpreter of them. The exercise of private judgment resulted in Protestantism, and it has been responsible for every division among Protestants since that time. Indeed, it is at the root of every prejudice regarding religion. (F. K.)

Privilege, a more or less permanent concession made by the legislator against or beyond the law. The emperors and the popes, especially since the 8th century, granted privileges. They may be acquired either orally or in writing, either by direct concession or by communication. This latter means partaking of a privilege either by extension or by aggregation. An extensive communication was applied to all regulars. Aggregation takes place between a confraternity and an archconfraternity. The distinction between personal and real privileges is noteworthy. Personal privileges are granted to the person as such, e.g., a title, garb; a real privilege is attached to a thing, as an altar, rosary. If a personal privilege is granted it need not be used, but it is not lost by non-use. A real privilege is lost by the absolute destruction of the thing. Otherwise, privileges are perpetual, unless expressly revoked (can. 63-79).—C.E.; P.C. Augustine. (C. A.)

Privileges, Ecclesiastical, general concessions made by the pope, who alone can grant something against the common law. Such are, properly speaking, only those mentioned in the Code, viz., the clerical privileges of protection against violence (privilegium canonia), of ecclesiastical court (privilegium fori), of personal immunity, of benefit in case of insolvency. They are not everywhere acknowledged. These privileges are shared by all clergymen and religious, also novices, and because attached to the status, cannot be waivered by individuals. They are lost by degradation, deposition, and the reduction to the lay state (can. 110-123).—C.E.; P.C. Augustine. (C. A.)

Probabiliorism, the doctrine which holds that when there are two opinions, one in favor of liberty and the other in favor of the law, if the latter is the more probable one, it must be followed; that is, the law must be observed, because it has stronger and higher claims than those of liberty. Theoretically probabiliorism may be defended, but it is not of much practical value, because it ultimately leads to tutiorism, which is entirely false and untenable. During the 17th and 18th centuries probabiliorism found a number of moral theologians, but today it has very few advocates. It is opposed to probabilism.—C.E., XII, 445. (P. S.)

Probabilism, the name applied by moralists to the system which holds that whenever a doubt exists concerning the licitness or illicitness of an act, and the doubt cannot be resolved, one is permitted to follow a solidly probable opinion in favor of liberty, even if the opposite opinion in favor of the law is more probable. The motto of probabilism is Lex dubia non obligat, that is, "A doubtful law does not bind." A doubtful law does not bind, the defenders of probabilism maintain, because a doubtful law has no claim on the will, which by its very nature is in possession of liberty.

All authorities agree that when there is question of a certain result which must by all means be secured, for example, the validity of a Sacrament, then a merely probable opinion may not be invoked, but that one must be followed which is absolutely safe and certain.

Probable time. It originally given systematic form by Bartholomew Medina (1527-81). His doctrine met with favor among a large number of moralists. Later, however, the Jansenists raised a fierce storm of opposition against it. The dispute went on for about a century. Finally it was ended by the thorough and scholarly treatment of the question by St. Alphonse. Today probabilism, either in the form ofequiprobabilism or absolute though moderate probabilism, is the doctrine commonly held by moral theologians.—C.E.; Slater, A Short History of Moral Theology, N. Y., 1909. (P. S.)

Probability, likelihood; the approach of a mental judgment to conformity with its object; approximation to truth. Probability produces in the mind the state of opinion. It occupies the whole range between doubt, the absence of assent, and certitude, which is complete and unreserved assent.
Intrinsic probability is based upon the nature of the object in question; extrinsic probability, upon the authority of those capable of forming a scientific judgment.

Probation (Lat., probare, to test), a period of trial instituted in the United States since 1900, during which a prisoner is freed from confinement and allowed to resume his ordinary free place in society, but only on condition that any new offense or failure to observe rules established for his conduct will make him again subject to the punishment previously imposed upon him. The purpose of punishment is, in part, to reform the prisoner and to secure in him an effective will not to repeat his offense. When this purpose is secured, and society is safeguarded against further damage, a fine assessed against him, or a period of imprisonment (during which the state must pay at a rather high rate for his support and care) seem both unnecessary and cruel. Hence the law now everywhere permits judges or boards of probation to allow a conditional remission of the punishment decreed for the offense of which the prisoner has been guilty. The probationer thus restored to freedom is required for a given term to prove by good conduct that he is worthy of this favor; it is clear, of course, that only by this practical test can society determine whether or no the reformation of life which he promises will be effectively carried out.

The value of the probation system is generally beyond question. Most first offenders against the law are sufficiently punished by the arrest, trial, and conviction, and need no further punishment to secure their good behavior in the future. There are, however, many cases in which the probationer abuses the freedom accorded him, and returns to his previous life of crime. The success of the system depends upon the prudence with which the judges make use of it, and upon the effectiveness of the supervision exercised by probation officers during the period of probation. Statistics show that under favorable circumstances more than sixty per cent of those placed on probation have no further criminal record. Another criticism is concerned with the basic philosophy of punishment. In this view, punishment is ordained, not merely for the reformation of the offender, but equally for the protection of society by warning others against the offense, and for the reestablishment of a state of justice, by forcing the offender to suffer in punishment the equivalent of the damage, loss, and pain which he has caused in violating the right of others. Admitting that a criminal is entirely reformed, punishment is not needed for his welfare, but remains important for these other two purposes. In answer, prudent thinkers will admit the general principles involved in the criticism, but will insist that in practical cases a prudent judge will consider these elements as well as the reformation of the prisoner, and will admit to probation only those cases in which all the purposes of justice are safeguarded.

Pro-Cathedral (Lat., substituted for), a church used as a cathedral in a newly-created diocese until a suitable cathedral can be erected. It differs in no way from a cathedral as to rights and privileges.

See Cathedral.

Procesional (Lat., procedere, to go forward).

1. A book containing the services in a religious procession; 2. a hymn sung during a religious service, especially when the clergy and choir enter the church; 3. path of a religious procession; 4. books pertaining to local churches (medieval).

Procesional Cross, a crucifix mounted on a staff, carried in solemn services at the head of a procession of the clergy.

Processions, sacred functions in which clergy and people go in parade from one sacred place to another. They may be conducted entirely within the church or may take place outside the confines of any building; even from one church to another. Their object is public supplication to God for some determined favor. They stir the faith of the pious to acts of piety; procure for participants great blessings from God; and give thanks to the Almighty for His favors. Ordinary processions are assigned to certain days, as those on Palm Sunday, Holy Thursday, Good Friday, and Corpus Christi (q.v.), or to certain functions as at the consecration of churches (q.v.). They are prescribed either by the liturgy, the Code of Canon Law, or decree of the bishop for a determined public cause, yet recurring by custom. Extraordinary processions are ordered in certain calamities or as thanksgiving for some signal favor. The decreeing of these extraordinary processions is by the bishop or at least with his sanction. The Roman Ritual admonishes the priests in charge of processions, either ordinary or extraordinary, duly to instruct the faithful of the time at which the procession is to be held and the order to be followed in it. The Ritual likewise gives the order of precedence for those taking part in the function. The cross, emblem of faith, should always be at the head of the procession (see Processional Cross). Other banners may be used if they are ornamented with religious designs or pictures. Processions of the Blessed Sacrament are a popular expression of devotion to the Blessed Sacrament.

Processus and Martinian, Saints, martyrs, d. Rome, date unknown. According to their Acts, they were wardens in the Mamertine prison in which Sts. Peter and Paul were confined; converted by them to Christianity and baptized; publicly venerated from the 4th century, and mentioned in the Martyrologium Hieronymianum. Relics in St. Peter's, Vatican, Rome. Feast, R. Cal., 2 July.—C.E.; Butler.

Procter, Adelaide Anne (1825-64), poetess and philanthropist, b. London; d. there. She was the daughter of Bryan Waller Procter ("Barry Cornwall"), and a convert to Catholicism, 1851. Her verses are unambitious, but have the merit of originality and give evidence of much culture. Her book "Legends and Lyrics," met with great success.—C.E.

Procurator, an agent who manages the affairs of another by virtue of his authority. According to Church law a procurator may be employed in juridical matters, attending councils, marriage, and the like. What the procurator does legally within the limits of his mandate must be regarded as done by the principal.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine. (W. J. M.)

Prodigal Son, parable in Luke, 15, the story of the son who took his portion of his father’s goods and squandered it by riotous living. When reduced to the depth of misery and obliged to eat the husks thrown to the swine, he betook himself of his father and resolved to return to him penitent. The father was watching for him, greeted him affectionately and killed the fatted calf to make merry over his return. The elder son resented the father’s rejoicing. The father silenced him by the reminder that: “thou art always with me, and all I have is thine, but . . . thy brother was dead and is come to life, was lost and is found.” This parable occurs in the same chapter as that of the lost sheep, and of the woman searching for the lost groat (piece of money). It impresses on us the earnestness with which Our Redeemer desires the repentance and return of a sinner, and it has caused innumerable conversions and acts of perfect love of God.—Poele, tr. Leahy, Parables of the Gospel, N. Y., 1915; Ollivier, tr. Leahy, Parables of Our Lord, Lond., 1927.

Professed, term applied to those persons received into a religious community upon taking vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. In some orders it is reserved for religious who have lived in their communities for a certain period, varying from five to twelve years, after pronouncing their vows.

Profession, RELIGIOUS, according to the existing law, denotes the act of embracing the religious state by the three vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience according to the rule of an order canonically approved, and by any additional vow or vows in accordance with the rule of a particular order. A continuous year of novitiate or probation is necessary before profession may be made, and, for the validity of solemn profession at least three years of simple profession must have preceded it; for lay brothers, six years. The aspirant must be of the full age required, generally sixteen years as the minimum, and personally at liberty to make the promises. Coercion renders them null and void. Regular profession admits of two divisions: simple, and solemn. The latter is now restricted to religious orders approved as such by the Holy See, simple vows being generally substituted, sometimes as perpetual, sometimes as temporary. In congregations without solemn vows, a term of temporary vows, varying from three to six years, precedes the perpetual vows. In some orders, those once professed renew their vows from year to year and, in the case of temporary profession, may return to the world. Simple vows are not, in general, a hindrance to the ownership of property. Profession entails the obligation of aspiring after perfection. Previous vows incompatible with the rule are thereby annulled, unless the vows are commutable. The ceremony of profession is described in the “Pontificale Romanum.”—C.E.

Profession of Faith, the public (official or unofficial) acceptance of the teachings of the Church. The baptized must profess their Catholic faith as often as non-profession would amount to a denial of the faith. Bishops and priests, according to canon law, must make official profession under certain circumstances. Converts to the Church in the United States must make a profession of the faith, except when Baptism is given unconditionally (see BAPtism).—C.E., IV, 478; P.C. Augustine; Griffin, The Priest’s New Ritual, N. Y., 1927. (F. T. R.)

Profession of Faith of Pius IV, that famous profession of faith, drawn up after the Council of Trent by Pius IV, whose public recital has since always been required of aspirants before their promotion to ecclesiastical offices. It embraces the Creed as recited at Mass; a profession of belief in and acceptance of Apostolic and ecclesiastical traditions and constitutions, as well as in the Church’s interpretation of Sacred Scripture; an assertion of belief in the seven sacraments with their proper efficacy as taught by the Catholic Church; an act of assent to the Church’s teaching regarding original sin as declared in the Council of Trent; an act of faith in the true propitiatory and sacrificial character of the Blessed Eucharist; an acknowledgment of the Catholic and the Apostolicity of the Roman Church and a promise of obedience to the Roman Pontiff as Vicar of Christ. The profession ends with a summary acceptance of all that the Church teaches and the council had defined as well as the rejection of all doctrines and practices not in conformity with the Church, (J. J. McG.)

Progress, (Lat., progredire, to go forward), an advance. Originally this term referred to movement in space, but by an easy figure of speech it now refers more especially to change for the better in any department of life: thought, morality, civilization, or science; or in generalized thought, to a supposed evolution of all nature, in which constant change brings even greater perfection. The doctrine of indefinite progress is, of course, as old as human optimism, but in our day has a special connotation in that it is associated with the materialistic philosophies of such men as Comte, Huxley, and Spencer. In its positive side, this system accounts for the progress of all nature, in which constant change is simply an innate tendency of all things to improve; and as to the future, the system predicts essential changes in all things to new and better forms, which in their turn will be still further improved. Familiar examples of the application of this theory are the visionary descriptions of the super-man, the super-state, and the doctrine that religion, morality, and truth are essentially relative and subject to modification in every successive age. No one can hold this view in its entirety, except by failure to make a careful distinction between progress that is real fact and progress that is only claimed, or between progress that is probable and progress that, despite prophecies, is impossible.
As to actual progress, this is determined by an accurate history of the past and present. Especially in the fields of natural science and man's control of natural forces, there is no doubt of the vast progress that has been made, particularly in the last century. One need only turn to the work of chemists, physicists, astronomers, engineers, and to the world of manufacture and communication, to see how completely changed and improved are modern conditions. Moreover, it would not be prudent to doubt that further discoveries and inventions will be made, achieving results quite beyond our present power of surmising. These examples are largely confined to the material aspect of life. Although admittedly of exceeding importance in itself and in its effects on social and individual life, this material aspect is only one section of our being. When we turn to other fields, progress is not so evident. The native intelligence of man (as contrasted with that of the higher animals) has not been rivaled since the time of the ancient Egyptians. The same is true of his essential make-up and in his spiritual activities, is not constantly changing, and more especially that in these matters there is no universal law of evolution and improvement.

Finally, in the matter of religion and morals, no Catholic admits, nor is there any evidence to show, that faith and ethics found upon natural laws and divine revelation have in our time been changed and improved. God's existence, His plan in creation, His revelation of Himself as Creator and Redeemer, are facts which cannot change. The 13th century showed a flowering of ability for pure speculation, for popular creation and appreciation of art, which has not been rivaled since. These familiar examples prove that man, in his conduct have not been changed by Him and cannot be improved. The earliest prehistoric races have left records of an entirely human intelligence, shown in the making and use of tools, in the striving for beauty in painting and sculpture, in religious practices and in belief in human survival. During the historic period, the intelligence of the Greeks seems to have been, not inferior, but superior to our own, and their classic sculptures, architecture, and literature, have not been improved upon. The Romans exhibited a genius in military affairs, in law and in civil administration which remains supreme. The 13th century showed a flowering of ability for pure speculation, for popular creation and appreciation of art, which has not been rivaled since. These examples prove that man, in his essential make-up and in his spiritual activities, is not constantly changing, and more especially that in these matters there is no universal law of evolution and improvement.

competency, however, in matters of faith, marriage causes, questions of sacred rites, and over religious as such. The headquarters of the Pontifical Society for the Propagation of the Faith are in this con-

Propagation of the Faith, SOCIETY FOR THE, an international association for the assistance, by prayers and alms, of Catholic missionary priests, brothers, and nuns engaged in preaching the Gospel in heathen and non-Catholic countries. Founded 3 May, 1822, at a meeting called at Lyons, France, by Fr. Inglesi, Vicar-General of New Orleans, when the efforts of an association founded by Pauline Jaricot were united with those in the United States. The organization is very simple; to become a member it is necessary only to recite daily prayers for the missions and to contribute at least 5 centimes monthly to the general fund. The president is Mgr. Marchetti-Salvaggiani, and the society is attached to the Congregation of the Propaganda, the head of which is Card. Van Rossum. It is administered by two general councils, one in Lyons, and one in Paris, each composed of 12 clergymen and laymen of recognized business ability, and noted for zeal and piety. They keep in close touch with the missions, and serve as headquarters for the distribution of alms received from the delegates; at the beginning of each year the total sum collected during the past year is distributed. Contributions for 1928 from the United States to the general fund amounted to $1,270,000.—C.E.

Proper. The two chief parts of the Breviary and Missal are: (1) Proper of the Season, or Proprium de Tempore, comprising lessons, antiphons, and other liturgical passages appointed for days of the year having special Mass and Office; (2) Proper of Saints, or Proprium Sanctorum, comprising those appointed for feasts of saints in calendar order. Proper of the Mass, those parts of the Mass which vary with the day according to the feast celebrated. It consists of the first four chants of the choir, Introit, Gradual (or Tract), Alleluia (or perhaps a sequence), Offertory and Communion; the Lessons, Epistle, Gospel (sometimes added lessons from the O.T.); the prayers said by the celebrant, Collect, Secret, and Postcommunion, often several of each to commemorate feasts coinciding with that being kept. (C. J. P.)

Property (Lat., proprius, one's own), that which is or may be owned. In its most general sense, it includes life, health, knowledge, and reput-tation, which belong to individuals. More strictly, it refers to the external material world as it is or may be subjected to ownership. The origin of property rights has occasioned much dispute among the philosophers. Among the false theories are those which trace this origin to ordinances of the state (Hobbes, Kant), to an original agreement or contract (Grotius, Pufendorf), to labor expended (Locke, Henry George), to injustice, fraud, and force exerted by the strong upon the weak. The proper view, supported by all available history, is that ownership of property is natural to man, a requirement for individual and social life, obvious in itself, and approved by reasoned consideration. Revelation assures us that God made the earth and all that it contains for the use of man, and that, in addition God explicitly made man the lord and owner of the earth. Property may be owned by man as an individual, or owned in common by social groups. The assignment of property to one or other form of ownership has varied widely in different countries, times, and civilizations. Primitive hunters and nomads have a very restricted private ownership, while our civilization gives private ownership a wide extent and restricts common ownership. Our system is under attack by socialists, who, in general, seek to restore all property to public ownership. Socialists find their strongest argument in the abuses and injustices which are easily discovered in the present distribution of material goods. While facts are indisputable, it is impossible to apply the socialistic remedy, involving more and greater evils than it seeks to cure. The philosophical bases of socialism are likewise condemned: economic determinism, materialism, rejection of religion and ethics. The Christian doctrine of private property teaches that man has a right to own, derived from his nature and God's institution; that the exercise of this right is limited by the requirements of justice, charity, and religion; that the institution of private property must not be overturned, but that, as far as may be, any abuses involved be corrected.

—C.E.; Cronin, Science of Ethics. (E. P. Maes.)

Property, Ecclesiastical, all temporal goods which pertain to the universal Church, to the Apostolic See, or to any mortal person in the church (see CORPORATIONS), as real estate, money, edifices, and sacred vessels. Jesus Christ instituted the Church as a perfect, independent, and visible soicity whose end is the sanctification and salvation of men, to be accomplished by the exercises of religion. The Church must therefore be self-supporting; its ministers, must build churches and altars, must establish and maintain religious and charitable institutions. Since the Church has been given the right to work for the salvation of men, it necessarily follows that it has the right to the means necessary for the attainment of that end; hence the right of the Church to property. The doctors and pastors of the Church have always maintained the principle of absolute ownership and free administration of ecclesiastical property independently of the civil power. This power of acquiring and possessing property belongs to the Catholic Church and to the Apostolic See by divine right. Individual dioceses, incorporated as independent entities, and the singular churches of the diocese, can possess and administer property. If canonically established as moral persons, chapters, religious orders, religious congregations and seminaries, can also exercise this right. In the United States church property is safeguarded by different methods; the bishop being instituted a corporation sole or by holding the ecclesiastical property in trust in the name of the diocese or in his own name by an absolute and full legal title. In some dioceses, each church is incorporated separately. The members of this corporation are ex officio the bishop, vicar general, and the pastor, who selects two laymen from the parish to represent the congregation. In this way, the bishop remains always in control.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine.

Prophecy, Prophet (Gr., prophetes, speaker for). The Hebrew words for prophet and prophecy, nabi and ha`azeh, mean: the first “interpreter and mouthpiece of God”; the second, the vision or revelation interpreted. A prophet in the O.T. was one who made known the will of God, not always by foretelling the future, but often by exposing and rebuking evil, by standing for the law. Abraham, Moses, Samuel, Balaam, Elias, Eliseus, and Nathan are mentioned as prophets. The prophets whose writings form a book of the O.T. are mentioned under Bible Books or. We gather from the prophetic books that prophecy was a vocation: that it required supernatural knowledge, revelation of some truths or facts by God and inspiration to utter and impress these on men. The bulk of the prophecies of the O.T. concerns the punishment of guilty nations, and the fulfilment of the ancient promises. This is to bring the new and final Covenant. Few will live to see or be worthy of it: from the remnant will arise the Messianic Kingdom, the nations united under the great king, the Son of David. The prophecies mentioned in the N.T. are those of Zachary, Elizabeth, Simeon, Anna, John the Baptist, and of Our Lord.—C.E.; Mas, Christ in Type and Prophecy, N. Y., 1912. (ed.)

Prophetess. In Holy Writ we meet several instances when women are honored with this title: Mary, the sister of Moses (Ex., 15); Deborah, who met out justice to the Tribes of Israel (Judges, 4); Huldah, the contemporary of King Josias (4 Kings, 22); and in the N.T., Anna, the daughter of Phanuel (Luke, 2). God is free to allot His gifts as He chooses.—C.E.

Propitiation (Lat., propitiare, to render favorable, to appease). (1) In general the appeasing or placating of an angry person. (2) Theologically, one of the three fruits of every good work, the other two being imprecation and merit. (3) One of the four ends of the sacrifice of the Mass: this end regards man. The propitiatory power of the Mass extends to “sins, punishments and satisfactions” for the living, and punishments for the departed. —Ghir, The Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, St. L., 1927. (c. J. D.)

Pro-Prefect Apostolic, a priest appointed as temporary successor of a Prefect Apostolic. (See Pro-Vicar Apostolic.)

Prose. See Sequence.

Proselyte (Gr., proselytos, stranger, newcomer), in Scripture, convert to the Jewish religion, some of them in full adhesion to the Jewish belief and ritual, others merely sympathetic with Judaism and in part co-worshipers; also a person induced to join a Church or sect by unfair methods.—C.E.
and many, Anglicans especially, who would not accede to this as a statement of their belief, called their religion Protestant. With the rise of the pro-Roman party in Anglicanism both the term and the thing are repudiated. However, in general all religious bodies separated from the Catholic Church and not comprehended in one of the schismatic Eastern Churches, are classed as Protestants.

Protestant Episcopal Church, the Anglican Church in the United States, an offshoot of the Church of England, established in the American colonies during the 17th century. After the Revolution, the early efforts were made to form a united Episcopal Church in America. Samuel Seabury of New England, having been refused consecration as bishop by the Abp. of Canterbury, was consecrated; subsequently three other American bishops were consecrated in England. The organization of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States was completed at the General Convention of 1789. The Church adheres to the Apostles' and Nicene creeds. Baptism is either by pouring or by immersion. The system of government includes the parish or congregation, the diocese, the province, and the general convention. They publish 10 general periodicals, 55 mission papers, 346 missionary helpers; 10,551 churches and chapels, with 17,551 members; and 346 schools, including 4 theological seminaries, thus winning by his extensive pioneer work the appellation of "Father Prout."—C.E.

Prothonotary Apostolic, member of the chief order of prelates in the papal Curia. There are four classes: (1) those who sign the papal Bulls, instead of the cardinal with pontificals; (2) those who are entitled to the same external insignia as class No. 1; (3) others outside of Rome who receive the dignity. They are entitled to the use of the pontificals. The privileges, dress, and insignia are defined in the "Motu Proprio" of Pius X, June 29, 1908.—C.E.

Protocanonical, referring to those books of the O.T. whose canonicity was never questioned. The term was probably first used by Sixtus of Siena in the 16th century (Bibliotheca Sacra, I, 1) to distinguish the accepted books of the Bible from the deuterocanonical writings, whose divinely inspired character had been for a time disputed. See Deuterocanonical.

Protocol (Gr., protos, first; kolé, glue), the first leaf glued to papyrus rolls, later a sheet with seal affixed, containing a summary of the document's contents by a notary; draft; original copy; minute record of document; register; preliminary memorandum in negotiations, serving as basis for final agreement; a convention less formal than a treaty. —C.E.

Proto-martyr, the first to suffer in any persecution, as St. Stephen, who is eminently the first who gave witness to Our Lord by shedding his blood. —(E.D.)

Protopope (Gr., protopopes, chief priest), term used in the Orthodox and Byzantine Uniat Churches to designate a priest of higher rank, who corresponds in general to the archpriest or dean in the Western Rite. —C.E.; Butler.

Protus and Hyacinth, Saints, martyrs (c. 257), d. Rome. According to their acts which, however, are considered apocryphal, they were Egyptians, probably brothers, in the service of St. Eugenia; arrested for their faith, they were burned at the stake, as their charred remains found in the cemetery at San Giovanni dei Fiorentini, 1845, indicate; the epitaph written by Pope Damasus calls them brothers. Body of St. Hyacinth at San Giovanni dei Fiorentini; St. Protus in church of the Propaganda. Feast, 11 Sept.—C.E.; Butler.

Prout, Father, pen-name of Francis Sylvester Mahony (O'Mahony; 1804-66), priest and author, b. Cork, Ireland; d. Paris. Ordained as priest at Lucca, 1822, he exercised his priestly office only for a short time at Cork. In 1834 he moved to London, wrote for "Fraser's Magazine," and "Bentley's Magazine," and was sent by Dickens to Rome, 1846, as correspondent for the "Daily News." After 12 years he went to Paris as correspondent for the "Globe." Popularly known as the author of "The Bella of的Shandon," he owes his literary fame, however, to his collection of writings "Reliques of Father Prout."—C.E.

Provancher, Léon Abel (1820-92), naturalist, b. Bécanour, Quebec, Canada; d. Cap Rouge. Ordained at Nicolet, 1844; he utilized his deep interest in nature in the study of Canadian flora and fauna, thus winning by his extensive pioneer work the appellation of "Father of Natural History in Canada." In 1868 he founded the "Naturaliste Canadien," which he edited for 20 years. Among his writings are "Flore du Canada," and "Le Verger Canadien."—C.E.

Proverbs, Book of, one of the Sapiential writings of the Vulgate after the Psalms, in the Hebrew (A.V.) among the Sacred Writings. According to the official edition of the Vulgate, the Hebrews called it Misle. The Latin term Proverbium implies a sententious expression of a practical truth. The Hebrew Misle indicates rather the form of expression, viz., "sententious expression in parable of individual truths capable of general application." The Book of Proverbs is a collection of practical rules for wise living set forth in poetical form, containing 31 chapters, divided as follows: the exordium defines the purpose of the book, i.e., to impart wisdom which will enable men to understand all kinds of proverbs (1, 1-7). (1) A series of poems concerning wisdom, its pursuit, fruits, enemies, and glory (1-16). (2) The Proverbs of Solomon; disconnected sayings in couplet form, sometimes repeated (10-32). (3) Other collections of proverbs: those regarded as an epilogue to the preceding (22-24); proverbs of Solomon collected by the men of Ezechias, King of Juda (25-29); the words of Gatherer (Agur), son of Vomiter (30); the words of Lamuel, the king (31, 1-9); and an alphabetic poem descriptive of a brave and strong woman, used as the Epistle in the Mass of Holy Matrons (31, 10-31). There is no question of individual authorship. The major portion is the work of Solomon, though the book in its present form may have been completed in the time of King Ezechias or even of Esdras. Its Divine origin (canonicity) is vouched for by its frequent use on the part of the rabbis and by the N.T. allusions and citations, e.g., Romans, 12, 19 and 20.—C.E. (t. xcl.)

Pro-Vicar Apostolic, a priest appointed by a vicar Apostolic to succeed him temporarily in the event of his death, or of his jurisdiction being impeded by captivity, exile, or inability.—Winslow, Vicars and Prefects Apostolic, Maryknoll, 1924.

Providence (Lat., providere, to foresee, provide), adapting means to an end, God in His Wisdom ordering every event so that the purpose of creation may be realized, and, in particular providing for every human being the means of working out his destiny and of serving and glorifying his Creator, Ruler, Redeemer, and Sanctifier. St. John Damascene calls it: "The will of God by which all things are ruled by right reason." It leaves no room for chance or for fate. It is the personal act of God in regard to man. It is the expression of His doctrine held with real assent by the mass of religious Englishmen, which seems to be true generally of Christians who are not members of the Church Christ founded.—C.E.; Downey, Divine Providence, N. Y., 1928.

Providence, city, Rhode Island, capital of. It is stated that as late as 1680 there were no Catholics in the colony founded by Roger Williams in Providence, although religious liberty was established there from 1636. The few who came there, for lack of priests, either left or fell away. The first appearance of Catholic worship was in 1780 when the French under Rochambeau were stationed there and the army chaplains celebrated Mass publicly. During 1813 Mass was said in a private house but it was not until 1837 that the first Mass was celebrated in a Catholic church built for that purpose. A second parish was erected, 1842, and the great increase in immigrants consequent to the famine in Ireland, 1843, necessitated the erection of several new churches, and those English-speaking parishes which are still important were erected in the fifties.

From 1844-47 Providence was the episcopal residence of the diocese of Hartford. An orphan asylum, convent, and schools were established, but the vigor of the Know-nothing movement and the apparent poverty of the parishioners prevented any appreciable growth of religious structures. The first bishop of the newly created diocese of Providence, Thomas Francis Hendricken, consecrated 28 April, 1872, began the erection of the new cathedral of Sts. Peter and Paul, which was completed during the episcopacy of Rt. Rev. Matthew Harkins, consecrated April 14, 1887. Under the latter's encouragement and advice several charitable organizations were founded, notably St. Maria's Home for Working Girls, founded, 1894, through the generosity of Joseph Banigan; the Paulist Fathers and Jordanville, e.g., Romans, 12, 19 and 20.—C.E. (t. xcl.)

Provincial Council, a consultative and deliberative assembly of the bishops, certain other prelates, and clerics, which should be convened in each ecclesiastical province at least every 20 years to discuss and decree whatever may appear conducive in its particular territory to the growth of the faith, the moderation of morals, the correction of abuses, the concluding of controversies, and the maintenance or introduction of uniform discipline. The metropolitan, or, when the metropolitan see is vacant or its incumbent legitimately prevented, the senior suffragan bishop, after consulting the fathers who have a deliberative vote, determines the place of assembly, giving preference to the metropolitan city, provided there is no reason for convening elsewhere: he also convokes and presides over the council. Upon its termination the president forwards to the Holy See all the acts and decrees, which are not to be promulgated before they are examined and endorsed by the Sacred Congregation of the Council. The method of their promulgation and the time at which they go into effect is determined by the council itself. The decrees oblige throughout the province, nor can the local Ordinaries dispense from them except in particular cases and for just cause. In remote preparation the metropolitan or the senior suffragan, as above, must call a meeting of the local Ordinaries of the province at least every five years to determine what should be done in their dioceses for promoting the good of religion and to make ready the matters that ought to be treated in a future provincial council.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine. (J. T. V.)

Provision, (Lat., providere, to take care, provide), a general term, used in ecclesiastical language to denote any concession of an ecclesiastical office. In the Church there are many offices held by clerics, and the general designation of the particular cleric to an office is called provision. Free appointment or collation, election, postulation, etc., are simply modes of provision. (C. N.)

Provision, Canonical, the conferring of an office by the proper ecclesiastical authority and in accordance with canonical legislation. This is the only legitimate way of obtaining an ecclesiastical office, and is made by free appointment, nomination and investiture, election and postulation. In English-speaking countries canonical provision is generally by free appointment. Two conditions are required; the fitness of the candidate, which is judged by the ecclesiastical superior, and that the office be vacant.—C.E. (C. N.)

Provistors, Statute of, English statute of Edward III incidental to the controversy between the English kings and the Court of Rome, concerning filling of ecclesiastical benefices by means of papal provisions. It courts that elections of bishops shall be free, that owners of advowsons shall have free collation and presentment, and that attempted reservation, collation, or provision by the Court of Rome shall cause the right of collation to revert to the king.—C.E.

Provost, (Lat., procurator, placed before), the dean or first dignity of a cathedral or collegiate chapter, appointed by the Holy See, whose principal office is to preside at capitular functions, assist the bishop when pontificating, administer to him the last sacraments, and conduct his obsequies.—C.E.; Ayrinæae, Constitution of the Church, N. Y., 1925. (S. R.)

Proxy, Marriage by. It is not necessary that in every case the contracting parties appear personally before the priest in order to receive matrimony. A proxy or agent may be used, representing an absent party, provided that he shows credentials in writing, signed by the absentee and by the parish priest or ordinary of the place where the commission was given, or at least by two reliable witnesses. Marriage Legislation in the New Code of Canon Law, N. Y., 1919. (J. P. S.)

Ps. = Psalm.

Psalms, Book of, a collection of Divinely inspired hymns or poems in the Canon of the O.T. as accepted by Jews and Christians; also known as the Psalter of David of 150 Psalms (Council of Trent). Psalm is from psalmos, equivalent of the Hebrew Mizmor (the title prefixed to 57 hymns in the collection), signifying "a song to the accompaniment of a stringed instrument, the psalterie or lyre." The Hebrew title of the book is "Tehilim" (hymns or songs of praise). Though David should be regarded as the chief author (Biblical Commission, 1 May, 1910), since 73 psalms bear his name only, other authors are mentioned. Others designated in the collection are: Moses, Ps. 89; Solomon, Ps. 71 and 126; Asaph, a choir leader (1 Par., 6), Ps. 49, 72-82 (probably composed by members of this family at different times between David's reign and the Exile, 583 n.c.); Eman, Ps. 87 (sons of Core mentioned); Ethan the Ezrahite, Ps. 88. The Sons of Core (2 Par., 20), is a designation of a guild of Temple singers, who composed or collected Ps. 83, 84, 86, and perhaps 87. Psalms bearing no mark of authorship are called "orphan psalms." While a few psalms may have been composed in the Machabean era, the vast majority were not only written, but the collection appears to have been practically completed, c. 529 n.c. Although the number 150 is traditional, the enumeration of individual psalms, between Ps. 9 and Ps. 146, has not been uniform in the different versions. We need not assume that the present form represents the original in its entirety. The Biblical Commission admits the acceptance of the theory that alterations, omissions, and transpositions may have taken place even in the Misericere, for liturgical, musical, or other reasons, provided the inspiration of the entire work be accepted. The Vulgate represents a translation made from the Hexapla by St. Jerome, A.D. 392, to replace a correction of the Vetus Latina which he himself had made, c. A.D. 385. The latter is still used in the Missal and in the Office as recited in St. Peter's, Rome.

The Book of Psalms is divided into five sections, based to some extent upon the titles, each section save the last closing with a doxology: (1) Ps. 1-40; (2) Ps. 41-71; (3) Ps., 72-88; (4) Ps. 89-105; (5) Ps. 106-150. The Biblical Commission directs that the importance of the titles, especially with regard to authorship, be not lightly set aside. Nearly 100 psalms have titles indicative of authorship, historical occasion, musical notation, or type of poetry. Each of the psalms has its own theme and purpose. Broadly speaking, eight classes may be distinguished: (1) hymns (thanksgiving, praise of God, His attributes and works in Nature and Grace), 8, 17, 102-106, 145-150 (Australiatic, Bonaventure applying the Office. There are two collections, the Roman and the Gallican Psaltery. The former is applied to collections of the Psalms of David as collected and used for the recitation of the Divine Office. It is the psalter now in use in all churches excepting St. Peter's, Rome. The translation was made, c. A.D. 393. The word psaltery is also applied to a musical instrument used in the sacred chants. It is a stringed instrument similar to a harp, and the music is produced by strumming the strings either with the fingers or a plectron.

Psalter of Mary (Psalterium Marianum), a work composed by St. Bonaventure applying the sentiments of the psalms and other canticles of Sacred Scripture to the Blessed Virgin. Also, the Rosary, because of the 150 Hail Marys, corresponding to the number of the psalms of David, forms the main part of the Breviary, the whole being recited normally in the course of a week. It is employed in the Introit, Gradual, and Offertory of the Mass.—C.E.; Boylan, The Psalms, Dub., 1920; Bird, A Commentary on the Psalms, Lond., 1926.

Psalter of St. Louis

Psaltery (Lat., psalterium), term ordinarily applied to collections of the Psalms of David as collected and used for the recitation of the Divine Office. There are two collections, the Roman Psaltery and the Gallican Psaltery. The former is the first translation of the “Vetus Itala” by St. Jerome which was finished, c. A.D. 385; the latter is a later translation, also by St. Jerome. This translation found a readyer acceptance in France and finally in the universal Church than the first. It is the psalter now in use in all churches excepting St. Peter’s, Rome. The translation was made, c. A.D. 393. The word psaltery is also applied to a musical instrument used in the sacred chants. It is a stringed instrument similar to a harp, and the music is produced by strumming the strings either with the fingers or a plectron.

Psychiatri, psǐk’ā-bre, Ernest (1883-1914), novelist, b. Paris; d. Belgium. A grandson of Renan, he received an excellent literary training. He became an officer in the Colonial Artillery. While stationed in Africa, he recovered his faith and resolved to join the Dominicans, 1914. He was killed during the first days of the World War. Psychiatri is known chiefly for two novels which are considered a spiritual autobiography: “Le Voyage du Centurion” and “Les Voix qui crient dans le Désert.”—C.E. Suppl.; Massais, “Vie d’Ernest Psychiatri,” Paris.

P.S.M. = Fathers of the Pious Society of Missions.

P.S.M. = Priests of St. Sulpice, or Sulpicians.

Psychoanalysis (Gr., psyche, soul; analusio, to analyze), a system of examining the soul, especially the faculty of memory, in order to discover possible experiences of the past which may account for present conditions, mental ailments, such as discouragement, weakness of will, anxieties, melancholy, inordinate fears, remorse. No doubt a scrutiny of the past helps one to correct what has been wrong and to regulate the present. However, it requires extraordinary discernment to recall one's past correctly, exceptional honesty to face it, and heroic frankness to reveal it to others, especially when one has no guarantee of their ability to analyze it correctly or fidelity to keep it secret. Confidence in the system has been much impaired by the fact that its practitioners seek to explain all mental conditions by previous sexual experiences, and cannot appreciate the fact that sex is only one of the many factors in human experience, and by far the least important factor in the lives of countless thousands.

Psychology (Gr., psyche, soul; logos, doctrine), in the most general sense the science of the soul and its operations. The ancients, Aristotle and the medieval Scholastics, treated the whole matter together; but in modern times, owing to the development of experimental sciences, a distinction is made between empiric psychology which, by use of experimental method (e.g., memory tests), studies data of consciousness, their laws, and correlation of body and soul; and rational (philosophical) psychology which analyzes the arguments of the purely deductive, studies the causes and principles of psychic activity on the basis of experimentally established facts (e.g., from operations of intellect and will argues the spirituality of human soul). To be complete, both empiric and rational psychology should embrace study of soul and its manifestations wherever found, in plants, brute animals, men. Since the goal of rational psychology is the establishment of the ultimate nature of soul and its manifestations, it must begin with data (normal and abnormal) supplied either by experiences of every-day life or by scientifically controlled experiment. In both cases the method to be followed is that of introspective observation aided and corrected by other supplementary sources, and of careful analysis of the various activities of living things. Based on the results of such study, rational psychology proceeds to an explanatory account of the nature of the agent or subject of these activities (soul), with its chief properties, e.g., the nature of life and of soul, the different kinds of life (vegetative, sensitive, intellectual), knowledge and appetition, spirituality and immortality of the human soul, and quite generally the question of the origin of life and of species (Evolution or Transformism).—C.E.; De La Vaisièrê, Elements of Experimental Psychology, St. L., 1926; Millar, General Psychology, N. Y., 1928; Maher, Psychology, N. Y., 1909.

Psychotherapy (Gr., psyche, mind; therepeuo, cure), name for the process of using the mind to influence the body when ailing, and help to relieve it or cure it entirely. It is no new thing, but as ancient as humanity; nor does it require any recondite knowledge or skill, since it is a matter of common experience. There is a great deal of quackery masquerading under the name. Christian Science relies on the process to a great extent. Unfortunately those who recommend and practise it do not believe in the existence of a soul as the principle of human life, but only in forces of one kind or other that constitute life.—C.E.; Walsh, Psychotherapy, N. Y., 1911. (Ed.)

Publican, among the Romans usually a man of equestrian rank. In the Gospels the word means a "tax-gatherer" employed by these wealthy Roman knights. They were universally detested by the Jews because they enriched themselves at the expense of their brethren, and hence in the N.T. they were regarded as traitors and classed with sinners (Matt., 9), harlots (Matt., 21), and the heathen (Matt., 18). No publican was admitted as a witness in court. A true Jew could not ask nor accept an alms from them. Some of this despised class were among the earliest disciples of John the Baptist and of Christ. The most illustrious of all the publicans was Matthew, or Levi, called by Christ to be an Apostle (Matt., 9).—C.E.; Cecilia, St. Matthew, Lond., 1906.

Public Confession, the confessing of one's sins to others besides the officiating priest with a view to receiving sacramental absolution. In the early Church the public confession of public sins was customary. Even secret sins were sometimes thus confessed, though for these the Church permitted auricular confession (q.v.). The custom of public confession began to decline in the 4th century. The only form in which it exists today is in confession made through an interpreter. However, extrasacramental public confession survives in the "chapter of faults" held in religious communities.—Kurtzheid, tr. Marks, The Seal of Confession. (F. R. C.)

Public Decorum, also known as Public Propriety (honestas publica), a diriment impediment to matrimony. If a party has contracted an invalid marriage with another, or if they have lived in public and notorious concubinage, the impediment exists between each of them and the ancestors and descendants of the other to the second degree in the direct line, i.e., from grandparents to grandchildren. There is no impediment collaterally.—Ayrinac, Marriage Legislation in the New Code of Canon Law, N. Y., 1910. (J. F. R.)

Public Penance, the reception of the sacrament of Penance with public acts of mortification, such as fasting, or the wearing of sackcloth, constituting the element of sacramental satisfaction. In the early Church this method of reconciliation was usually required of those who committed scandalous sins, even though the confession was secret. Public penance continued in a mitigated form until the 14th century.—Pohle-Preuss, The Sacraments, III, St. L., 1924. (F. S. C.)

Pudentiana (Potentiana), Saint, virgin, martyr (c. 150). She is said to have been the daughter of the Roman senator, St. Pudens, and, with her sister, St. Praxedes, died for the Faith. Pope Paschal I (817-24), had her remains placed in the church of St. Praxedes. The church of St. Pudentiana, probably the oldest in Rome, is supposed to have been built on the site of her dwelling-place. Relics in churches of Sts. Pudentiana and Praxedes. Feast, 19 May.—C.E.; Butler.

Pueblo Indians (Sp., village), name used collectively to designate those Indians of New Mexico and Arizona, of sedentary agricultural habits and permanent houses. Christianity was first preached to these tribes by the Franciscans, and the missions flourished until the revolt of the Pueblos in 1680. With the exception of the Hopi and some of the people of Laguna, the Pueblo Indians are nominally Catholic, though attached to ancient rites.—C.E.

Pugh, George Ellis (1822-76), jurist and statesman, b. Cincinnati, O.; d. there. A Catholic convert, he served in the Mexican War, and played a prominent part in politics as the first native of Ohio to sit in the Senate (1860), by supporting Douglas's doctrine of popular sovereignty. His most noted legal argument was in the Vallandigham habeas corpus case. 1813.—C.E.

Pugin, Augustus Welby Northmore (1812-52), architect, b. London; d. Ramsgate, England. He revived the architectural forms of medieval England and championed truth and fitness in architecture. His enthusiasm for Gothic art, liturgy, and the sacred chant led to his conversion to Catholicity, 1834. Made professor of ecclesiastical antiquities at St. Mary's College, Oscott (1838-44), he wielded his influence through numerous writings, notably "Contrasts, a Parallel between the Noble Edifices of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Centuries and the Present Day," the "Glossary of Ecclesiastical Orna-Devotion to the Pure Heart of Mary is a special phase of Christian devotion to the Mother of God. Devotion to the pure Heart of Mary was inspired by the love of that Heart for God and man, and also from the desire to honor the Immaculate Heart which was a symbol of all that was purest and best, of all heroic virtue, of charity, of purity, of humility. Public devotion to the Heart of Mary was first promulgated by St. John Eudes, founder of the Society of Jesus and Mary (Eudistes). He had the feast celebrated at Autun, 1848, organized religious societies to promote this devotion, and composed an office for the feast. The devotion was given new impetus by the apparition of the miraculous medal and the establishment of the archconfraternity of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, Refuge of Sinners, at Our Lady of Victories, Paris. The office and Mass were approved by the Congregation of Rites 21 July, 1555. The feast is celebrated on the Sunday after the octave of the Assumption.

Purgatorial Society, an organization whose object is to assist the souls in Purgatory (q.v.) by prayers, Masses, and good works. Belief in the existence of Purgatory, and in the possibility of the living assisting the suffering souls has inspired the faithful to pray for the dead from the very beginning of Christianity. During the middle ages, especially among the Anglo-Saxon and Germanic nations, many societies were established for this purpose. One of the duties incumbent on the members of the artisan’s guild was to pray for their departed colleagues. There still flourishes at the church of the Campo Santo del Tedeschi in Rome a purgatorial society founded in the 15th century. An archconfraternity for the souls of the suffering under the title of Our Lady’s Assumption is canonically erected at the Redemptorist Church of Santa Maria in Montereone at Rome. In the United States a very extensive society of this nature, called the Purgatorial Society, under the direction of the Redemptorist Fathers, has branches in New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Buffalo, Baltimore, Pittsburgh, St. Louis, Chicago, New Orleans, Kansas City, Detroit, and Portland, Ore. Similar organizations are directed by several other religious orders.

Pulpit (Lat. pulpitum, stage or scaffold), an elevated stand for preaching. Its immediate precursor was the ambo (q.v.). In the early Christian era the bishop preached from the cathedra. Later the ambo was the place for reading the Gospel and delivering sermons. In the building plan of St. Gall (820) the pulpitum is found in the central part of the nave. It was later a part of the rood-loft; movable pulpits of wood were also used. The sculptured pulpits of Pisano at Siena and Pisa are examples of the finest work of the 13th century in Italy. At Prato there is an example of an outside pulpit. In the Renaissance they are of either bronze or marble and are projected from a pillar or wall. The Belgian pulpits of the Baroque period are remarkable for their size and luxuriant carvings. The style of the pulpit should be subordinated to that of the high altar and it should be placed so as not to obstruct the view of the sanctuary.

Pulver Day (Lat. pulveris, dust), old English name for Ash Wednesday.

Purification of Jesus (Lat. purgare, to cleanse), in ecclesiastical language, the state of temporal penal punishment for those souls, who having died in the state of grace, are not entirely free from venial sins or have not yet fully paid the satisfaction due to their transgressions. It is not a state of positive growth in goodness and in merit, but of purification effected by suffering. The Catholic doctrine, defined at the Council of Florence and repeated at the Council of Trent, is: (1) that there is a Purgatory; (2) that the souls suffering there can be helped by the prayers of the faithful, especially by the Sacrifice of the Altar (Trent, Sess. xxv). Although Holy Scripture does not expressly mention Purgatory, it presupposes it, and refers to it clearly enough, e.g., 2 Mac., 12; Matt., 5 and 12; 1 Cor., 3; Phil., 2; 1 Peter, 3. Purgatory is firmly established by tradition and confirmed by the constant belief of the Church in sufferages for the dead. The chief punishment consists in being deprived of the beatific vision (prena sensus), which, according to the common belief of the Western Church, consists in real fire. They are certain of their salvation, and are confirmed in good, hence can no longer sin. Since they love God perfectly, they bear their sufferings with resignation. This love of God and resignation to His holy Will, according to many theologians, considerably lessens and mitigates the severest sufferings of Purgatory. In the early Church some heretics denied the existence of Pur-
Purgatory. In the Middle Ages the Cathari, Waldenses, and Hussites rejected it, and in the 16th century Luther and Calvin and their followers did the same. Protestants, therefore, generally reject it. The Greeks have a vague and indefinite notion of it. Belief in Purgatory fosters piety. It deters man from venial sin, begets a spirit of penance, gives him occasion to practise charity to the dead, and awakens salutary thoughts of the life to come.—C.E.; Pohle-Preuss, Eschatology, St. L., 1924; Newman, The Dream of Gerontius, St. L., 1924; Thorold, The Dialogue of St. Catherine, London, 1808.

Purgatory, St. Patrick's, a sanctuary famous since the time of St. Patrick and located on Station Island, Lough Derg, Donegal, Ireland. It was under the Canons Regular of St. Augustine in the Middle Ages, then under the Franciscans, and now is governed by secular priests. The church of St. Patrick was built in 1780. About 3000 pilgrims annually take part in the severe penitential exercises.—C.E.

Purification of the Blessed Virgin, Feast of the, or Candlemas Day, 2 February. It commemorates the purifying of the Blessed Virgin according to the Mosaic Law, 40 days after the birth of Christ, and the presentation of the Infant Jesus in the Temple. The feast was introduced into the Eastern Empire by Emperor Justinian I (527-565), and is mentioned in the Western Church in the Gelasian Sacramentary of the 7th century. Candles are blessed on that day in commemoration of the words of Holy Simeon concerning Christ “a light to the revelation of the Gentiles” (Luke, 2), and a procession with lighted candles is held in the church to represent the entry of Christ, the Light of the World, into the Temple of Jerusalem. “Candlemas” is still the name in Scotland for a legal term-day on which interest and rents are payable (2 Feb.).—C.E., III, 245.

Purifications. Contact with certain objects, as for instance a corpse or the hones of a dead person (Num., 19), or certain physical conditions such as for instance those connected with the sexual life (Lev., 15), made a person “unclean,” that is to say, unable to take part in divine worship and to associate with his fellowsmen, for a longer or shorter duration of time, and to be restored to normal condition one had to undergo a cleansing or purification which varied according to the causes that had produced the state of legal uncleanness. The lighter form of uncleanness, resulting from touching an unclean person, lasted for one day; purification consisted in the washing of one's clothes and bathing (Lev., 15). A more serious form of uncleanness lasted for seven days and required different kinds of purifications. In the case of one who had touched a corpse, the water of aspersion or expiation containing the ashes of the red cow (Num., 19) was to be used on the third and on the seventh day. The uncleanness connected with childbirth (Lev., 12) required a sacrifice of a year-old lamb and one or two young pigeons or turtle doves. The ritual of the cleansing of a leper, far more complicated, consisted of ceremonies performed partly in the camp or city, and partly in the sanctuary (Lev., 14). Besides the cases described above of purifications from legal uncleanness, we have in the O.T. a number of other ceremonial cleasnings prescribed to some classes of persons or for some special occasions, which may be regarded also as purifications. Such was the washing of hands and feet by the priests before entering the Tabernacle of Testimony and coming to the Altar (Ex., 30); or the bath of the High Priest on the Day of Atonement (Lev., 16). Of the same character was the washing of the garments imposed on the people as part of the preparations for the giving of the Law at Sinai (Ex., 19). Purifications, especially washing, would naturally suggest the idea of moral purification, and accordingly we find the expressions connected with ceremonial washings used in a metaphorical sense (Ps. 50; Is., 16).

Purim or D.V., Purim (of Lots), a Jewish festival to commemorate the deliverance of the Jews from the evil doings of Aman, Xerxes's minister, who had obtained from King Assuerus an edict for their massacre, the date being appointed by lot. Through the intercession of Esther the slaughter was prevented (Esth., 8). The feast is celebrated on 15 Adar with great solemnity.—C.E.

Puritans, a term originally applied to those who in the established Church of England strove to “purify” it from “all taint of popery.” The separation of the English Church from Rome did not go far enough to suit the extremists who, affected by the dour sternness of Calvinism, sought to impress every external sign of the old religion. Bishop Hooper, who was imprisoned, 1530, for refusing to be consecrated to the See of Gloucester in pontifical vestments is often referred to as “the first Puritan.” At all events, Puritans always frowned upon such adjuncts as vestments, candles, the sign of the Cross, the keeping of Holy Days, and similar practices. The Puritans were at first a party in the Church of England, and they were divided into three groups: (1) those who would tolerate episcopacy and the Book of Common Prayer (relaxed if possible to suit them); (2) those who sought to introduce Presbyterianism; (3) those who desired to set up a complete congregational independency. Obviously the latter two could not remain long in the established Church as it was constituted, and they subsequently withdrew. The first settlers of the Massachusetts colony were Puritans who had not left the Church of England at home, but who did so in drawing up their articles of government in America. Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," Baxter's "Saints' Everlasting Rest," and Foxe's "Book of Martyrs" are works characteristic of Puritan thought and temperament. Puritans generally have been characterized by a gloomy outlook on life, gaiety or festivity being looked upon by them as essentially evil, or as inevitably leading to evil.—C.E. (F. K.)

Purity of Body (Lat., puritas), the state of one who does not indulge in illicit venereal pleasure; in the unmarried, the state of virginity; in the married, conjugal chastity. (W. O. B.)

Purity of Intention, the perfection of motive inspiring human action. In actions that are merely natural, purity of intention is had when the motive coincides with the objective nature of the action done, e.g., to eat for the purpose of conserving and building up the body; an intention is pure in the supernatural order when the action is done for the love of God. (W. o. B.)

Purity of Our Lady, Feast of the, 3rd Sunday of October, granted in 1751, at the request of King Joseph Manuel, to Portugal, Brazil and Algeria. It was conceded, with the rank of double major, to the Hermits of St. Augustine (Augustinians), 7 Aug., 1789. (N. M. W.)

Purple or Violet, an emblem of penance used during the penitential seasons of Lent and Advent, except on saints' days and on the two Sundays when rose may be substituted. (J. C. T.)

Purse, emblem in art associated with St. Nicholas of Myra, St. Matthew, and St. John de Matha. St. Nicholas is represented with three balls which are taken to mean the three purses of gold which he threw in at a window. St. Matthew is so represented because he was a tax-collector. St. John de Matha is represented as receiving a purse from the Blessed Virgin for the redemption of captives.

Pursuivants, originally minor officials, assistants to the heralds. Later the name was given to officers of the king whose duty was to serve warrants. In the penal times in England, they were often hunters and trackers-down of priests. They figured largely in the capture of many of the priests who later died on the scaffold. (M. P. H.)

Pusey, Edward Bouvier (1800-82), clergyman, b. Pusey House, Berkshire, England; d. Ascot Priory. The son of Philip Bouvier of Pusey, he assumed the name of the manor upon his succession. Educated at Eton and Oxford, Pusey took high rank as a scholar, and, 1828, was appointed Regius Professor of Hebrew and Canon of Christ Church. He became associated with the Oxford Movement (q.v.) and was in many ways its greatest exponent and guide. Deeply read in the Church Fathers he conceived the idea of bringing Anglicanism to the norm of the ante-Nicene Church. He wrote three of the "Tracts for the Times," those on Baptism, which are replete with erudite quotations. He had little sympathy with the ritual controversies, though theoretically he held with those who were engaged in them. His writings, usually lengthy, ponderous, and difficult to read, were voluminous and sound. He did much to revive the practise of private confession in Anglicanism and was the founder and adviser of several modern Anglican sisterhoods.—C.E. (F. K.)

Pusillanimity, a smallness of soul which shrinks from honorable actions. Its foundation is ignorance of man's dignity and his great capacity through grace for good. It betrays itself in a sluggishness towards every kind of spiritual activity. (H. J. W.)

Pustet, the name of a family of well-known Catholic publishers. The founder was Friedrich Pustet (1738-1882) of Passau, later of Ratisbon, who set up one of the first printing machines and erected a paper factory for which he procured the first paper machine in Bavaria. In 1845, he began printing liturgical works. His sons extended the business: Karl (1839-1910) superintended the German works; Klemens (1833-98), the paper factory; and Friedrich (1851-1902), the liturgical works, which earned for him the title of "Typographus S. R. Congregationis" and the honor of being entrusted by the Vatican with the editio typica of all the liturgical works. They were succeeded by Friedrich Pustet, the son of Friedrich, and Ludwig, the son of Karl, who have established branches in Rome, Cincinnati, and New York.—C.E.

Putative Marriage (Lat., putare, to think), if a couple are not really married but are publicly reported to be man and wife, and at least one of them believes that they are lawfully married, the supposed marriage is called putative. As long as the good faith of at least one of them endures, such a marriage has the effects of lawful wedlock in regard to the legitimation of the offspring.—C.E.; Ayrinhac, N. Y., 1919. (J. F. S.)

Puteoli, pū-te'o-lē, seaport of Campania, Italy, N. of the Bay of Naples. Here St. Paul spent seven days, and then set out for Rome by the land route (Acts, 28); the modern Pozzuoli.

Puthiah, an officer of Pharaoh, probably captain of the state police, who bought Joseph as a slave. On his wife's false accusation he cast Joseph into jail (Gen., 39). (V. P. D.)

Puvic de Chavannes, pū-vēs dē šā-vān', Pierre (1824-98), decorative painter, b. Lyons, France; d. Paris. He studied with Henry Scheffer, Eugène Delacroix, and Thomas Couture, but after two visits to Italy he created his own characteristic style of fresco, distinctly decorative, and according to his canons flat and light in color. Scorned at first, his work is now appreciated for its striking originality. Although essentially modern it suggests Giotto. His most famous works are "The Childhood of St. Gene­viève," and two later paintings of the saint, in the Pantheon of Paris, the decoration of the hemicycle of the Sorbonne, and the staircase frescoes of the Boston Public Library. After 1891 he was president of the National Society of French Artists.—C.E.

Pythias, Knights of. See Secret Societies.

Pyx, plks (Gr., pyxos, box-tree), a vessel in which the Sacred Host is either preserved or carried. It is made of precious metal, gold or silver, and if made of silver, is usually gold-plated. The pyx, or ciborium, is the ordinary receptacle for the preservation of the Sacred Host in the tabernacle. A smaller pyx is used for carrying the Blessed Sacrament to the sick. This is a small round case and should be gold-plated at least inside. It suffices for from one to four or five hosts.—C.E.; O’Brien, History of the Mass, N. Y., 1882. (r, w. S.)
Quadragesima (Lat., quadragésima, fortieth), any season of 40 days’ preparation by prayer and fasting, especially Lent, week days from Ash Wednesday to Easter Eve numbering 40.—C.E.

Quadratus, Saint (c. 125), apologist, Bp. of Athens, “Disciple of the Apostles.” He was the first Christian apologist, and addressed a discourse to the Emperor Hadrian containing an apology for the Christian religion. This has disappeared but Eusebius states, incorrectly however, that it moved the emperor to issue a favorable edict. Quadratus is quoted in Eusebius and Jerome, and mentioned in the martyrologies. Feast, 26 May.—C.E.; Butler.

Quamichan Indians, a tribe of Salishan stock in British Columbia, former Quamichans, formerly they lived by hunting and fishing but now are more sedentary and industrious. They are almost all Catholics.—C.E.

Quakers. See FRIENDS.

Quapaw Indians, a tribe of Siouan stock of the Mississippi region, now nearly extinct. They were in advance of the northern tribes in architecture and pottery and had an elaborate ritual. They were always friendly to the whites and at enmity with the southern tribes. They were evangelized first by the Jesuits and later by the Vincentians. The majority of them are Catholic.—C.E.

Quarantines (Lat., quarantina, forty), a rigorous fast of 40 days according to the prescriptions of the ancient Church. Water, bread, and salt once a day was the only nourishment permitted. The indulgence of quarantines means the remission of so much temporal punishment due to sin, as would equal 40 days of such rigorous penance.—C.E. (A.C.)

Quarr Abbey (St. Mary’s Abbey), Ryde, Isle of Wight, founded, 1003, by Benedictines driven from the Abbey of Solesmes, France. After residing for a year in a house nearby, the monks erected the present buildings upon the site of the ancient abbey of Appuldurcombe, founded, 1270, by Benedictines of the Abbey of St. Mary de Montisbourg, Normandy, given to the Poor Clares, 1442, and suppressed during the Reformation. “The new abbey was consecrated, 1012; priests, 17.”

Quebec. Shortly after the foundation of the colony by Champlain, 1608, the Recollects came from France, 1615, to establish missionary headquarters there. They were joined by the Jesuits, 1625, sent out through the influence of the Duchesse d’Aiguillon under whose patronage the Sisters of the Hôtel Dieu also came, 1639. The early missionaries depended directly upon the Holy See until 1632, when the Abp. of Rouen was given jurisdiction. His authority continued until 1639, when François de Montmorency Laval, Bp. of Petreasa and Vicar Apostolic of New France, landed in Quebec. The parish church of Quebec, begun in 1647, was consecrated, 1666, became and still remains the cathedral, having been thrice reconstructed: 1744-49; 1767-71, after being practically destroyed during the siege; 1925, when, after being burned down, 1922, an exact replica of the former church was rebuilt. In 1847 it was honored with the title of basilica. The Jesuit college, opened, 1635, was the seat of higher education, and all pupils of the seminary, founded, 1603, were trained there until after the conquest. Upon the inauguration of British rule the Canadians requested the King to maintain the Catholic Hierarchy and permission was gained for the consecration of Bp. Briand, in Paris, 1766, but the Recollects and Jesuits were forbidden to receive novices; the latter were left in possession of their estates, however, until the death of the last priest, when they were confiscated. Their college having been turned into military stores and barracks, the responsibility of education devolved upon the seminary where classes were opened, 1765.

Through Bp. Briand’s loyalty to England religious freedom was granted to the Canadians and in the same year he wrote “Religion is perfectly free. I can exercise my ministry without any restriction.” The government granted him an annuity of £250 and £150, for rebuilding the episcopal palace. Other historic monuments are: the church of Notre Dame des Victoires which dates from 1690, when, after several unsuccessful attacks upon the city, Admiral Phipps withdrew, and Bp. Saint-Vallier dedicated the church to Our Lady of Victory; the Ursuline church and convent, the oldest educational establishment for women in North America, occupying the same ground granted to the religious by the Company of New France upon their arrival, 1639; here Montcalm is buried; the General Hospital of Quebec, established, 1695; the Hôtel Dieu, rebuilt after the fire which destroyed it, 1755; and Laval University, founded, 1852, the outgrowth of the first Council of Quebec held, 1851. During the celebration of the tercentenary of the founding of Quebec, 1908, a monument was erected to Bp. Laval; since 1907 “L’Action Catholique,” a branch of “L’Action Sociale Catholique”, has been published here. The Catholic population of the city now numbers 129,000; St. Anne is the patroness of the city.

Quebec, Archdiocese of, Quebec, vicariate apostolic, 1657; diocese, 1674; archdiocese, 1844; embraces Quebec, Portneuf, Montmorency, Kamouraska, Islet, Montmagny, Beltechasse, Dorchester, Lévis, Beauce (except the townships of Spalding, Ditchfield, and Woburn), Lotbiniere, Megantic, and a part of Temiscouata counties. Suffragans: Three Rivers, Rimouski, Chicoutimi, Nicolet, Gaspé, and the Vicariate-Apostolic of the Gulf of Saint Lawrence. Bishops: François de Laval de Montmorency (1658-88); Jean Baptiste de la Croix Chevrier de St. Vallier, (1688-1727); Louis François Duplessis de Mornay (1727-33); Pierre Herman Dosquet (1733-38); François Louis Pourroy de L'Auberville (1739-40); Henri Marie Dubreuil de Pontbrìand (1741-60); Jean Olivier Briand (1766-84); Louis Philippe Mariauchau D'Esgris (1784-88); Jean François Hubert (1788-97); Pierre Denaut (1797-1806); Joseph Octave Plessis (1806-25); Bernard Claude Panet (1825-39). Archbishops: Joseph Signay (1832-50); Pierre Flavien Turgeon (1850-67); Charles François Baillargéne (1867-70); Elzear Alexandre Cardinal Taschereau (1871-98); Louis Nazaire Cardinal Bégin (1898-1925); Paul Eugène Roy (1925-26); Raymond Marie Cardinal Rouleau, O.F. (1926). Churches, 264; priests, secular, 750; priests, regular, 120; religious women, 2102; university, 1; convents and academies, 190; seminaries, 2; colleges, 5; institutions, 39; Catholics, 410,000.—C.E.

Queen’s Daughters, a Catholic religio-charitable association established by Mary Hessey in St. Louis, December, 1889, and incorporated 6 January, 1902. Members call on the poor in their homes to relieve material needs and to encourage them to live according to the tenets of their religion and to be solicitous about the religious upbringing of their children. It conducts cooking and sewing schools, hospices for women, altar societies, etc., and cooperates with the work done by juvenile courts. Certain religious congregations are affiliated with it and are allotted funds to execute their charitable labors. Its branches are under the jurisdiction of a general council.

Queensland, Vicariate Apostolic of, Australia; established in 1887 for the aborigines of the Colony of Queensland; administered from Brisbane.

Queens University, Belfast, founded as result of New Universities Act, 1908; undenominational; faculties: art, science, law, medicine, commerce, applied science and technology, agriculture; number of professors, 32; student body, about 1200. The Municipal College of Technology, Belfast, is in conjunction with it.

Quem terra, pontus, sidera, or THE GOD WHO. M. J. W. (ed.)

Qui, Quesnel, PASQUIER (1634-1706), writer, b. Paris; d. Amsterdam. He joined the Congregation of the Oratory but the doctrines propounded in his writings were condemned by Clement XI. Quesnel was profoundly imbued with the errors of Baius and the Jansenists, and on account of the Jansenist opinions which he emphasized he was relegated to Orleans. Expelled from the Congregation of the Oratory, 1684, Quesnel went to Belgium and published numerous works under assumed names. Arrested, 1703, he fled to Holland, where he continued to write in support of his ideas. He requested and received the Last Sacraments, and made final profession of his faith.—C.E.

Quicumque certum queritis, or ALL YE WHO SEEK A COMFORT SURE, hymn not found in the latest edition of the Breviary, but given for Vespers and Matins in an Office of the Sacred Heart granted by special permission. The author is not known, but the hymn was written in the 18th century. There are six translations. The English title given above is by E. Caswall.—Britt.

Quicumque Christum queritis, or ALL YE WHO WOULD CHRIST DESCRY, hymn for Vespers and Matins on 8 June, Feast of the Transfiguration of Our Lord. It was written by Prudentius (348-413) and has 24 translations. The English title given above is by A. McDougal.—Britt.

Quiet, PRAYER OF, a peaceful internal pleasantness proceeding from the soul which is attracted and captivated by the charms of Divine Presence. It is a spiritual repose, the result of contemplative love. This prayer is the gift of wisdom, which by its light shows God present, and makes the soul experience His presence by a most pleasing sensa­tion of the spirit. The sweet delight expands itself into the powers and faculties of the soul.—C.E.; Poulain, tr. Smith, Graces of Interior Prayer, St. L., 1911. (M. J. W.)

Quietism (Lat., quietus, quiet), a false or exaggerated mysticism, inculcating the view that the soul in all its relations with God should be entirely passive, self-suppressing or annihilating, and wholly absorbed in Him. It is characteristic of the pantheistic religions of India. Historically it appeared among the Gnostics and other early sects, later among the Beguines, Praticehli, and Brethren and Sisters of the Free Spirit. Molinos, in the 17th century, attempted to give it a theological basis. In his view, desire on man’s part to do anything active is an offense against God; the soul, by annihilating itself, returns to its source, the essence of God, and becomes divinized; it need not concern itself about its virtues, death or eternity, heaven or hell. This “onward way” has nothing to do with confession; it puts an end to sin, etc. The doctrine infected many eminent men, but it was condemned in 1675. Luther’s faith without works was a reminiscence of it, but his followers strangely enough now stress work without special regard to faith.—C.E.; Poulain, tr. Smith, Graces of Interior Prayer, St. L., 1911. (M. J. W.)

Quilon, Diocese of, India (British possession); comprises the southern half of the native state of Travancore, and the territories of Travancore and Anjengo; suffragan of Verapoly; entrusted to the Belgian Discalced Carmelites; vicariate 1853; diocese 1886. Bishops: Ferdinand Maria Ossi, O.C.D. (1886-1905); Aloysius Maria Benziger, O.C.D. (1905), residence at Olikaray, Churches, 210; chapels, 49; priests, secular, 71; priests, regular, 20; high schools, 6; middle schools, 20; industrial schools, 16; parish schools, 188; institutions, 15; Catholics, 185,702.

Quinn, MICHAEL JOSEPH (1796-1843), journalist and writer, b. Thurles, County Tipperary, Ireland; d. Boulogne-sur-Mer, France. He contributed to the “Morning Herald” and the “Morning Chronicle,” edited the “Monthly Review” (1825-32), the “Catholic Journal,” and the “Tablet,” and founded (1836) and edited the “Dublin Review.” His works include “A Steam Voyage down the Danube” and “Steam Voyages on the Seine, and Moselle, and the Rhine.”—C.E.

Quincy College and Seminary, Quincy, Ill., founded 1860, college and preparatory seminary under Franciscans. Faculty, 26; students, 257.

Quiñones, Francisco, Cardinal (c. 1482-1540), liturgist, b. Leon, Spain; d. Veroli, Italy. He entered the Order of Friars Minor and was elected commissary general of the Ultramontane Franciscans. In 1523 he was chosen minister general but renounced the generalship, 1527, and was created cardinal the following year. Cardinal Quiñones always occupied a distinguished position in the Sacred College, and watched closely the movement of the Reformation in Germany. He has left some legislative compilations for his order, but is best known for his reform of the Roman Breviary.—C.E.

Quinquagesima (Lat., quinquagesima, fiftieth), Sunday within the fifth decade or 50 days before Easter.

Quiricus and Julitta, Saints, martyrs (304), d. Tarsus, Cilicia. According to their Acts, Julitta fled with her three months old son, Quiricus (Quirinus), from Lycaonia, at the outbreak of the Maximinian persecution. She sought refuge in Tarsus, but she and the child were put to death there. Their cult was popular in the west at a very early date. Believers, Patrons, and in the monastery of Saint-Amand, Tournai. Feast, 16 June.—C.E.; Butler.

Quirinal Palace, residence of the Italian royal family on the Quirinal Hill, Rome, before 1870 a papal palace where conclaves were held. Also used as summer residence. It was built by Gregory XIII in 1574, and enlarged by later popes.

Quito, capital of the Republic of Ecuador, in 1565 the headquarters of a Franciscan province. It contained a seminary in charge of the Jesuits, which was the center of ecclesiastical studies for all middle, and northern South America, and high schools run by the Dominicans and Augustinians. It was ruined by an earthquake in 1735 but was rebuilt and in 1829 became the capital of Ecuador. Quito is remarkable for its beautiful churches especially the 17th-century Jesuit church of Santa Ana, San Francisco, La Merced, and El Sagrario. The university founded by Sixtus V and Philip II and opened, 1621, by the Jesuits, was reorganized 1895 and is now a State institution. It still occupies a portion of the old Jesuit College, and its excellent library is formed in part from the San Luis seminary. The observatory was erected under the celebrated astronomer, Fr. Menten, and German Jesuits lectured there until they were expelled, through the Masons. The diocese was erected by Paul III, 1545; Pius IX made Quito a metropolitan see, 1848, with the dioceses of Cuenca and Guayaquil as suffragans, to which have been added the sees of Ibarra, Riobamba, Loja, and Porto Viejo. The archdiocese includes the province of Pichincha, León, and Tunguragua, and contains 80 parishes, 195 priests, and 420,560 Catholics. The seminary is in the care of the Vincentians.

Quodcumque in orbe nexitibus revinxeris, or PETER, WHATEVER THOU SHALT BIND ON EARTH, hymn for Vespers and Matins on 18 January, Feast of St. Peter’s Chair at Rome and on 22 February, Feast of St. Peter’s Chair at Antioch. It is attributed to St. Paulinus, Patriarch of Aquileia (726-802). The complete hymn has nine verses. Besides several early anonymous translations, there are ten later ones; of these three are of the entire hymn. The English title given above is by E. Caswall.—Britt.

Quo vadis (‘Whither goest thou?’), words spoken by Our Lord of Himself to the Apostles before His Ascension and repeated in the Gospel (John, 16, 5) read on the fourth Sunday after Easter. Title of the celebrated Polish novel by Henryk Sienkiewicz, 1895, translated into English by Jeremiah Curtin.
Rabanus (Rhabanus, or Rabanus) Maurus, blessed (c. 780-856). Abp. of Mainz, b. Mainz, Germany; d. Winkel. He joined the Benedictines at Fulda, became a pupil of Alcuin at Tours, and returning to Fulda, taught there and became principal of the school. In 814 he was ordained and in 822 was made abbot of the monastery. His rule was distinguished by material, intellectual, and spiritual progress. His resignation was probably forced by King Louis the German, whom he had opposed in favor of Lothair. Rabanus became Abp. of Mainz in 847; during his episcopacy he held three important synods. He left commentaries on the Scriptures, a martyrology, and other religious works. Relics lost at Halle during the Reformation. Feast, 4 Feb. —C.E.

Rabaul, Vicariate Apostolic of, Territory of New Guinea, Oceania; named New Britain, 1889; New Pomerania, 1899; Rabaul, 1922; comprises the main islands of New Britain, New Ireland, New Hanover, Admiralty, Wagrip, St. Matthias, Matty and Durren; entrusted to the Missionaries of the Sacred Heart, Vicar Apostolic: Gerard John Vesters (1923), residence at Vunapope. Churches, 44; chapels, 173; priests, 48; religious women, 108 (of which 50 are nuns); colleges for catechists, 2; schools, 200; pupils, 7124; Catholics, 26,399.

Rabbi (Heb., reb, lord, teacher), in the O.T. the epithet reb denoted any eminent title of office, even the general of an army (Jer., 39). In the N.T. rabbi is the honorable title by which disciples addressed their Master. Thus Christ was usually addressed by His disciples and by the people. The epithet well expresses the character of the Redeemer; and therefore He calls Himself rab (Matt., 23). Nicodemus is also given this title by Christ himself (John, 3). The Jewish Scribes and Pharisees eagerly sought the honor of this appellation. Jesus admonishes His disciples against this vainglory (Matt., 23). In the Mishna period the Jewish scholars were generally distinguished by this title. All the modern Jewish clergy are called rabbi. —C.E. (A. E. B.)

Rabbism, the teachings and traditions of the rabbis. The rise of rabbinism was gradual. It stretched back to the time of Eudras and Nehemiah, if not beyond it. It is a synthesis of the opinions of Jewish scholars of the East and the West from the aforesaid probable date of origin to the end of the 4th, or, maybe, the 6th century of the Christian era. The great rabbis of the Middle Age are not reckoned as a part of the movement, because their method was far more scientific. Only a small remnant of the Jews of the captivity returned. The greater part and the more influential remained in the Persian Empire. Hence naturally we have Babylonian and Palestinian Rabbism. A third element also came into being in the West among the Hellenist Jews who had felt the influence of Greek culture. Philo was of this contingent. The great Rabbinal thesaurus and code of laws is the Talmud which divides itself into the Babylonian and Jerusalem Talmuds. —C.E. (A. E. B.)

Rabboni, used in Mark, 10, by Bartimaeus and in John, 20, by St. Mary Magdalen, is another form of rabbi, later Aramaic form, but considered a higher and more honorable title. —W. S. R.

Raca. "Whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca" (Matt., 5). A term of contempt; St. Chrysostom says: despided, vile, dirty, poor, St. Jerome says, in the sense of good-for-nothing.

Raccolta, Rācołta (Ital., a collection), a book containing prayers and pious exercises to which indulgences have been attached by the popes; also the decrees granting these indulgences and the conditions necessary for gaining them. All these indulgences are applicable to the souls in Purgatory. It was first published in Italian in 1807; editions of 1877-58-98 are the official publications of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences. An English translation has been authorized by the same Congregation. —C.E.; The New Raccolta, Phila., 1909; Collectio Precum Piorumque Operum, Rome, 1929. —C. J. B.

Rachel (Heb., a ewe). Laban's younger daughter and favorite wife of Jacob (Gen., 30-31). Mother of Joseph and Benjamin (Gen., 30-35), she died giving birth to the latter and was buried near Bethlehem. —C.E. (V. P. R.)

Racine, Jean (1639-99), dramatist, b. La Ferté-Milon in the old Duchy of Valois; d. Paris. Early an orphan, he was sent by relatives to the College of Beauvais, to Port Royal, and to the College of Harcourt. In 1663 he wrote two odes which made him known at court, and in 1664 his first play, "La Thébaïde," was performed. Then came "Alexandre," followed by the enormously successful "Andromaque," 1667; his sole comedy, "Les Plaideurs," 1674; and "Bérénice," 1670; "Bajazet," 1672; "Mithridate," 1679; and "Iphigénie," 1674. After the failure of "Phèdre," 1677, Racine severed his stage connections for 12 years, partly from conscientious motives and partly because of unjust criticism and rivalry; but, at the request of Mme. de Maintenon, he wrote, for her protégées at St.-Cyr, "Esther," 1689, and "Athalie," his masterpiece, 1681. On these his fame chiefly rests. Racine was a leader of the classical school, choosing always in marked contrast to his contemporary, Corneille, "a simple action... progressing steadily to the catastrophe... sustained by the interest, the feelings, and the passions of the characters." He is a great painter of love as a violent, jealous, and sometimes criminal passion. His works are keen psychological penetration and an exquisite literary sense. He was a man of deeply religious sensibilities. —C.E.
Radegunde, Saint (518-87), queen of France, b. Erfurt, Saxony; d. Poitiers. She was the daughter of King Berthachar of Thuringia, and was given to Clotaire I as a hostage after the conquest of her country, 531. In 540, Clotaire made her his wife against her will. After the death of her brother, she sought refuge with St. Medardus, Bp. of Vermandois, from whom she received the nun's veil. She founded the convent of the Holy Cross, near Poitiers, adopting the rule of St. Cæsarius of Arles. She remained there for 30 years. The poet Fortunatus, with whom she enjoyed an ideal friendship, composed his hymn "Vexilla Regis," in her honor. Patroness of Poitiers. Represented receiving an apparition of Our Lord. Relics burned by the Calvinists, 1562. Feast, 13 Aug.—Butler.

Ragged cross (Croix ragulée), a form of cross with jagged points along its arms, resembling cut twigs. (J. F. S.)

Raguenau, Paul (1608-80), missionary, b. Pau. He founded the Society of Jesus and went to Quebec, and was soon sent to the Hurons to direct their missions. Later he joined the fugitives on St. Joseph's Island and led a small band to Quebec. In 1650 he became vice-rector of the College of Quebec and superior of the Canadian mission. Removed to Three Rivers, he was sent as superior to the Iroquois mission. Raguenau's genius and energy realized the escape from massacre, and return to Quebec, of all the French in the Iroquois country. He returned to France and remained there as procurator of the mission.—C.E.; Campbell, Pioneer Priests of North America, N. Y., 1908.

Rainalducci, Pietro (Nicholas V), antipope (1328-30), b. Corvaro, Abruzzi, Italy; d. Avignon. He returned to Rome to become secretary of the Sacred College. When Louis the Bavarian came to Rome seeking to uphold the theory that the Emperor and the Church were joint rulers of the State, 1273, he joined the Ghibellines, appointed six cardinals and underwriters considered compromising. In 1328 he took to govern the Church. When Louis left Rome the antipope's adherents abandoned him. He submitted to John at Avignon and accepted confinement there until his death.—Pastor.

Rále, Sébastien, missionary (1654-1724), b. Pontatlier, France; d. Norridgewock Mission, Me.; d. Avignon, France. He entered the Jesuit novitiate at Dole, studied theology at Lyons, and arrived at Quebec, 1689. He began his missionary labors at an Abenaki village, near Quebec, to which he returned after an interval of two years spent among the Illinois Indians. In 1705 the English burned his church; he was Librarian of the Holy Roman Church. He returned to Rome to become secretary of the Sacred College. When Louis the Bavarian came to Rome seeking to uphold the theory that the Emperor and the Church were joint rulers of the State, 1273, he joined the Ghibellines, appointed six cardinals and underwriters considered compromising. In 1328 he took to govern the Church. When Louis left Rome the antipope's adherents abandoned him. He submitted to John at Avignon and accepted confinement there until his death.—Pastor.

Rampolla del Tindaro, Mariano (1843-1913), cardinal, statesman, b. Polizzi, Sicily; d. Rome. After acting as auditor of the nunciature at Madrid, he returned to Rome to become secretary of the Propaganda for Eastern affairs. Consecrated bishop, he was again sent as nuncio to Madrid. In 1887 he was raised to the dignity of Cardinal-priest of St. Cecilia and became Secretary of State, Archpriest of St. Peter's Basilica, and Grand Prior of the Order of Malta. After the election of Pius X, he was Librarian of the Holy Roman Church. He wrote a Life of St. Monica and a Life of St. Augustine, and spent the remainder of his life in the service of the Congregations to which he belonged.—C.E.; Suppl., 627.

Ramsey Abbey, Huntingdonshire, England, founded, 960, by Ailwine, a Saxon noble, encouraged by St. Oswald of York, and peopled with monks from Westbury (Worcester). Modney (Northfolk) and St. Ives were dependent priories. At the Dissolution, 1539, it was resigned into the king's hands.—C.E.

Raphael, DIOCESE OF, Ireland, comprises nearly 700. His successors included Donald MacNeill, Nial O’Boyle (d. 1610), John O’Culenan (1625-61), James O’Gallagher (1725-37), Patrick McGettigan (1820-61), Daniel McGettigan (1801-71), James McDevitt (1871-79), Michael Logue (1879-87). Patrick O’Donnell (1888-1923), William MacNeeley (1923); residence at Letterkenny. Churches, 52; priests, 90; religious women, 62; college, 1; intermediate schools, 3; primary schools, 225; institutions, 8; Catholics, 95,944; others, 24,814.

Raphael, RENÉ (1621-87), b. Tours, France; d. Paris. He joined the Society of Jesus in 1639, taught rhetoric and wrote extensively in prose and verse, both in French and Latin. His two poems, “Eloge Sacé” and “Jugement de Pyrame et Thisbe,” place him in the front rank of Latin versifiers. His best critical essays are “Observations sur les Poèmes de Virgile et d’Horace,” and “Réflexions sur la Poétique d’Aristote”; but his two posthumous works, “Histoire du Jansénisme,” and “Mémoires sur l’Eglise, la Cour, la Société, le Jansénisme,” are his titles to celebrity.—C.E.

Rashness, an act or vice opposed to the virtue of prudence and to the gift of counsel. Prudence is acquired by a memory of past experiences, the consideration of actual circumstances, comparison of reasons pro and con, an ingenious foresight of possible consequences, and the advice of elders. Rashness passes over all this, with very little deliberation. In judgment, it is an act of the mind which asserts something without solid foundation and with lack of evidence.—C.E.

Rationalism (Lat., ratio, reason). (1) An Episcopal humeral, counterpart of the pallium, worn by certain German bishops in the Middle Ages, somewhat like the ephod of the Jewish high-priest. (2) Episcopalian clasp of precious metal and “fort with lid” IV, worn over chasuble, like the breast ornament of Aaron. Not long nor widely in use.—C.E.

Rationalism is based is that of the absolute autonomy or independence of reason. Rationalists claim to find the formula for this autonomy in the words of Descartes: “nothing is to be declared true, but what is evidently so”; but Descartes himself admitted that supernatural mysteries were evidently credible on the authority of God revealing them. According to rationalism, reason is the supreme judge of what is true, what false, what merely symbolic in Sacred Scripture (Spinoza, "Tractatus Theologico-Politicus"). Historically, modern rationalism proceeds from the Lutheran principle of private interpretation of the Bible. The reformers rejected the authority of the Church; the rationalists afterwards rejected the authority of God (Con. Vat., "Constitution Dei Filiius"). As early as the 16th century some Protestants applying the principle of private interpretation rejected or interpreted symbolically the supernatural mysteries of the Trinity, the Incarnation, the Redemption, and the Eucharist. The doubts and contesting questions raised by the interpretation of Sacred Scripture led many to believe that nothing certain could be known from revelation and hence natural religion sufficed, e.g., Hobbes, Hume, Voltaire, Rousseau, Spinoza, and Wolff.—C.E.; Hurst, History of Rationalism, N. Y., 1882.

Ratio Studiorum (Lat., ratio, view, method; studium, study), term commonly used to designate the educational system of the Jesuits; an abbreviation of the official title "Ratio atque Institutio Studiorum Societatis Jesu." It was formulated during the years 1584-99 by representative Jesuits from various parts of Europe, who drew upon the great universities of the day, Liège, Louvain, and Paris, and the humanistic schools of the Renaissance. The "Ratio" contains regulations for the officials and teachers. The system is flexible and provides for instruction in the natural sciences as well as the classics and the higher studies of philosophy and theology. It insists on a few well-related subjects taught thoroughly and engrained in the pupil by means of compositions, discussions, disputations, and contests. The teachers take a personal interest in their charges and instruct them most thoroughly in faith and morals. Well-regulated physical exercise and discipline combine with the course of studies to produce a system whose efficacy has been proved by its results and endurance.—C.E.; Schwickerath, Jesuit Education, Its History and Principles, St. L., 1903.

Ratisbon (Ger., REGENSBURG), city, capital of Upper Palatinate, Bavaria, and former state of the Holy Roman Empire. Originally the Celtic Radersbona, in Roman days Castra Regina, a frontier fortress, Ratisbon was the seat of the apostolic labors of St. Rupert, c. 697, St. Emmeran, c. 710, who founded a monastery, and St. Erhard, 739; in 739 it was made a bishopric by St. Boniface. The bishops received much property, including several imperial domains and the administration of a few places in Lower Bavaria, and they enjoyed secular powers such as the right of coinage and were made princes of the empire in the 17th century. Ratisbon was the seat of the German Diet, 1663-1806. Secularization was finally accomplished in 1810, when Prince-Primate Dalberg was compelled to surrender his territory to Bavaria. In the city are numerous monasteries, that of St. James possessing an 8th-century chapel, a Gothic cathedral (1275-1354), and the Stephanskirche dating from the 10th century.—C.E., XII, 657.

Ratisbonne, Maria Alphonsine (1814-84), converted Jew, b. Strasbourg, Alsace-Lorraine; d. Ain Karim, near Jerusalem. Having lost all faith, in 1842, he was converted to Catholicity by a miraculous apparition of the Blessed Virgin at the church of St. Andrea delle Fratte at Rome. He assisted his brother Theodor in founding a sisterhood of Our Lady of Sion, 1843, ordained in 1847, he transplanted the Sisters of Sion to Jerusalem, 1855, and built convents and orphanages for them. He labored with companions for the conversion of Jews and Mohammedans until his death.—Maria Theodor (1802-84), preacher and writer, director of Christian Mothers, brother of preceding; b. Strasbourg, Alsace-Lorraine; d. Paris. Converted from Judaism, he embraced Catholicity, 1826, and was ordained, 1830. He obtained permission from Gregory XVI to labor for the conversion of Jews, and established the Order of Our Lady of Sion for the Christian education of Jewish boys and girls. He wrote a life of St. Bernard, Manual for Christian Mothers, and Meditations of St. Bernard.—C.E.

Ravenna, city of northern Italy. An important Roman city, it was the seat of a bishop, St. Apollinaris, in the first century, and residence of the emperors in 404. From 568 to 752 it was under the rule of the Lombards. After this period, it was united to the dominions of the Holy See, annexed to Venice in 1438, part of the Cispadane Republic in 1797 and finally joined to the Kingdom of Italy in 1860. Among the many martyrs who suffered there were Sts. Ursicinus, Fusca, Maura, and Vitalis, and among its bishops, Sts. Peter Chrysologus (433), Damianus (688), Felix (703), and Rinaldo (1303). Ravenna is highly important in early Christian and Byzantine art. Besides the Church of Santi Nazario e Celso, dating from 440, there are San Apollinare Nuovo and San Vitale, both due to the Gothic King Theodoric's patronage of art, San Apollinare in Classe, and many others containing rare mosaics. The city is now the center of an archdiocese having 220,000 Catholics, 200 churches, 150 secular priests, and 125 nuns.

Ravignan, Gustave Xavier Lacroix de (1795-1858), pulpit orator and author, b. Bayonne, France; d. Paris. Educated in Paris, he resigned his army commission to study law and, elected to the bar, was deputy attorney-general by 1821. Entering a Sulpician monastery, and later joining the Society of Jesus, he was ordained in 1828, and after several years as professor and retreat-preacher went to Notre Dame, where his logic, serenity, and zeal won souls by the hundreds. Superior of his brethren at Bordeaux, 1837-42, and at Paris, 1848-51, he preached throughout France and in Rome, Belgium, and London. His calm, eloquent "De l'Existence et de l'Institut des Jésuites," 1844, indicating the Society, sold 25,000 copies in one year. However, the Jesuits' strife continued until they were forced to disband for a time in France, but despite painful controversy with his superiors and imputations from other quarters, he remained loyal...
Palma, Majorca Island; d. near Cabrera Island.

BLESSED (1232-1315), "Doctor Illuminatus," b. vert the Mohammedans. In 1266 he became eminent at the court of King James the Conqueror. During the early years of his life, he was prominent as the Third Order of St. Francis. After a brief effort to propagate Christianity at Tunis, he was forced to leave and go to Naples. He taught physics by a heavenly apparition he was inspired to convert the Saracens he opened schools in Tunis and Barcelona for instruction in Oriental languages. Canonized, 1601. Patron of canonists. Emblems: a key, book, and cloak. Feast, R. Cal., 23 Jan.—C.E.; Butler.

Raymbault, CHARLES (1602-43), missionary, b. France; d. Quebec, Canada. Entering the Society of Jesus, he was procurator to the Canadian mission when he was called to Quebec. He traveled to the Sault Ste. Marie with Fr. Jogues on a voyage of exploration and to effect a more permanent apostolate. Exhausted, he returned to Quebec and was the first Jesuit who died in Canada.—C.E.

Raymond Lully (Teut., wise protection), BLESSED (1232-1315), "Doctor Illuminatus," b. Palma, Majorca Island; d. near Cabrera Island. During the early years of his life, he was prominent at the court of King James the Conqueror. By a heavenly apparition he was inspired to convert the Mohammedans. In 1266 he became a member of the Third Order of St. Francis. After a brief effort to propagate Christianity at Tunis, he was forced to leave and go to Naples. He taught physics at Paris for some time and then began missionary work in Armenia, Cyprus, and Egypt. His teaching is characterized by a rationalistic mysticism by which he identified theology with philosophy, failing to discriminate between natural and supernatural truth. The Church, fearing the dangers that might follow from so extreme a rationalism has withheld his canonization. He was stoned at Bougie, Africa, and died from the wounds. Relics in cathedral of Palma. Feast, 3 July; O.F.M., 27 Nov.—C.E.

Raymond Nonnatus, SAINT, confessor (c. 1200-40), cardinal, b. Portello, Spain; d. Catalonia. Having been taken from the womb of his mother after her death, he received the name Nonnatus. He became a member of the Order of Our Lady of Ransom in Barcelona and, promoted for his piety and diligence, was sent as ransomer to free the captives at al-Djaza'ir (modern Algiers). There he endured the greatest hardship and persecution because of his persistence in converting the Mohammedans. Ransomed by his Order, he returned to Spain and was made a cardinal by Pope Gregory IX. In spite of his rank he lived as a simple religious; died of fever on the way to Rome. Patron of midwives and those falsely accused. Relics in chapel of St. Nicholas, Portello. Feast, R. Cal., 31 Aug.—C.E.; Butler.

Raymond of Penafort, SAINT, confessor (c. 1175-1275), b. near Barcelona, Spain; d. Barcelona. In 1195 he received the degree of Doctor of Laws and held the chair of Law at the University of Bologna. Upon his return to Spain, 1222, he entered the Dominican Convent at Barcelona, where he taught for six years. With St. Peter Nolasco he established the Order of Our Lady of Ransom. One of the scholars of his day, he became adviser to Pope Gregory IX and was employed in editing the "Decretals," held as the authority on Canon Law until 1317. For two years, 1238-40, he served as Superior of his Order. To aid the work of converting the Saracens he opened schools in Tunis and Barcelona and was made a cardinal by Pope Gregory IX. He was the first Jesuit who died in Canada.

Reader. See LECTOR.

Reading Abbey, Surrey, England, founded 1121 by Henry I, an independent English abbey, though retaining the Cluniac observance. Leominster in England, and Rindelgros and May in Scotland were under its jurisdiction. It disappeared at the Dissolution. It is still used as a title by Benedictine abbots.—C.E.

Real presence. In the Sacrament of the Holy Eucharist after the consecration of the bread and wine, our Lord Jesus Christ, True God and True Man, is truly, really, substantially, and abidingly contained under the species of these sensible things, i.e., bread and wine. This doctrine is opposed to the various Protestant teachings of a figurative, symbolic, dynamic, or transient presence (see EUCHEMISTRY).

Rebaptism. St. Paul's doctrine, "One Lord, one faith, one Baptism" (Eph., 4) was reaffirmed by the Council of Trent, explicitly defining that Baptism imprints a spiritual and indelible character. The nature and efficacy of this character forbid the repetition of the Sacrament once validly administered. This traditional teaching is emphasized in the New Code of Canon Law (can. 732). When reasonable doubt exists concerning the fact or validity of Baptism the Sacrament is administered conditionally. This cannot be called a "rebaptizing" in the sense of a repetition of the Sacrament. The controversy on rebaptism between Pope St. Stephen and St. Cyprian of Carthage is celebrated. (F. T. B.)

Rebecca (Heb., one who ensnares), wife of Isaac, daughter of Bathuel and sister of Laban (Gen., 25). She was instrumental in obtaining for him Isaac's last blessing and in saving his brother's wrath (Gen., 27). (F. P. D.)

Rechab and Rechabites (Heb., square or chamber). Rechab was the father of Jonadah who, with Jehu, exterminated the followers of Baal (4 Kings, 10). He bade his descendants not to build houses, not to sow, not to plant vineyards, but to dwell in tents. Their fidelity in obeying these commands was praised of God himself and given as an example to the Jews (Jer., 35).—C.E. (F. P. D.)

Recollection (Lat., recolligere, intensive of colligere, get together), term used in ascetical books to express the attention and concentration of mind on the subject of meditation or reading and on the motives or intentions with which one should perform various duties; the opposite of distraction, dissipation of mind. St. Aloysius was remarkable for the ease with which he kept his mind on the subject of his prayer.—C.E.; Poulain, tr. Smith, The Graces of Interior Prayer, Lond., 1910. (Ed.)

Recollects, a reform branch of the Observant Friars Minor. Franz Doulecker, formerly a Capuchin, gave permanence to the recollection and in saving France, monasteries to which the friars might withdraw to devote themselves to prayer and penance. From 1606, the Recollects had provinces of their own; in 1897 they were incorporated in the Order of Friars Minor.

Recollets. See HERMITS OF ST. AUGUSTINE.

Rector (Lat., regeo, rule). (1) A priest placed in charge of a church which is neither a parochial nor a capitular church nor annexed to the house of a religious community for its religious functions; loosely used also to designate a pastor, and a deacon of a capitular church nor annexed to the house of a religious community, was forbidden to move five miles from his house without a license, under pain of forfeiture of his goods. Recusants convicted were within three months of conviction either to submit and renounce their belief in the supremacy of the Pope over the Church, or if required by four judges, to abjure the realm. If they did not depart, or returned without a license, they were guilty of capital felony. These laws were in force from Elizabeth's reign to that of George III. They were enforced with varying strictness.—C.E.; Smith, Dict. of the Bible, 2nd ed., (D. H.)

Red is the color of warmth and blood. Vestments of that color are used in Masses of the Holy Ghost, to remind us of the tongues of fire which descended upon the Apostles, and of the fire of charity, which is a gift of the Holy Ghost. It is used also on the feasts of the Holy Cross of Our Lord, and on the festivals of all saints who shed their blood for their faith. (J. C. T.)

Redeemer, Feast of the Most Holy, 23 Oct. or third Sunday of July, in honor of the graces and benefits of the Redemption. It was instituted at Venice in 1576, in thanksgiving for the cessation of a plague and is now found only in the special calendar of some dioceses and religious orders.—C.E.

Redemption (Lat., redimo, buy back). Just as sin consists of a twofold element, namely, guilt (reatus culpa) and a penalty (reatus panis), so too Christ's Death involves a moral and a penal phase. The moral element is Christ's obedience and love, the penal element, His Passion and Death. In the Redemption, as it took place historically, the two elements were indissolubly united. Christ's redeeming and loving obedience took the form of, and expressed itself in, sufferings and death. In this sublime work the Head was intimately associated with His mystic members: "If one died for all, then all were dead" (2 Cor., 5). In this whole redeeming work, Christ acts as the Head of man and, is intimately united to the humanity which He came to save. It is in virtue of this solidarity between the race and Christ, its Chief, that His redeeming acts have a value for all His mystic members. In Him we expiate our sins and satisfy Divine justice, in Him we are reconciled to God and to God we. The fundamental reality of the Redemption can be viewed from different aspects. Since Christ is our Head, the relation of His works to His members is similar to that of the works of a just man to himself; and thus Christ by His Passion merited salvation for us. Since this merit has reference to the offense against God and to the remission of sins, it is vicarious satisfaction. Furthermore, since Christ's obedience and love, His satisfaction, takes place through penal sufferings and an immolation of Himself to God, it is a sacrifice. Finally, when this sacrifice has been accomplished, and the guilt and penalty of our sins expiated, man is redeemed and liberated from the power of sin, of the flesh, and of the devil, and restored to the supernatural state. The Resurrection is an essential complement of the redeeming Death. Christ, says St.
Paul was “delivered up for our sins, and rose again for our justification” (Rom., 4). It is the risen and glorious Christ Who dispenses to the members of His mystic body the atoning merits and graces of Calvary. Baptism, the initial sacrament by which we appropriate subjectively the graces of the Cross, is viewed by St. Paul as a mystic death and resurrection with Christ: “Know you not that all we, who are baptized in Christ Jesus, are baptized together with Him by baptism into death; that as Christ is risen from the dead by the glory of the Father, so we also may walk in newness of life” (Rom., 6). Two erroneous conceptions of the Redemption are prevalent. The first considers the Passion of Christ as a mere material endurance of pain, the immolated Christ of Calvary as an inert victim, and man as a mere passive spectator of the drama. The other reduces the whole Redemption to a mere ethical appeal, to its psychological subjective influence on our lives.—C.E.; The Atom­ment, ed. Lattey, Camb., 1925. (R. G. B.)

Redemptions, PENITENTIAL, a system of atone­ment in vogue in the Church from about the end of the 8th to the end of the 11th century, whereby easier and shorter exercises were substituted for works of penance imposed by the early canons. It originated in England and, in another form, in Ireland. These substitutions assumed different and varied forms such as fasting, prayer, and especially alms-deeds. This led to grave and serious abuse in as much as the wealthy began to evade the com­muted penance by hiring a substitute. This practise was severely condemned (cf. Council of Clovesho, a.d. 747). The commutations and compensations of penitential redemptions can be regarded as true indulgences only when granted by the Church in lieu of other penances prescribed by the canons.—C.E.

Redemptions. See CONGREGATION OF THE MOST HOLY REDEEMER.

Red Mass, Mass at which the celebrant wears red vestments. These are used in Masses of the Holy Ghost, usually celebrated at the opening of courts, legislative assemblies, and schools; Masses of the Holy Cross of Christ; and Masses of Apostles and Martyrs.

Redmond, John Edward (1857-1918), Irish Nationalist leader, b. Broadway, Ireland; d. Lon­don. Educated at Clongowes and at Trinity College, Dublin, he was called to the English and Irish Bars. He was the Parliamentary representative for New Ross, 1881-85, for North Wexford, 1885-91, and for Waterford City, 1891 until his death. Elected chairman of the Irish Parliamentary Party, 1900, he introduced a bill to repeal the oath and the test acts, and rallied the Catholics to the defense of the schools. He was one of the most eloquent politicians of his time, and published “Historical and Political Addresses.”

Red Sea, the NW. arm of the Indian Ocean, about 1400 m. long and 200 m. wide, lying be­tween Arabia on the E., and Africa on the w., connected with the Mediterranean Sea by the Gulf of Suez and the Suez Canal, and with the Indian Ocean by the Strait of Bab-el-Mandeb. No important river flows into it, and it is noted principally for its heat. In the Bible it is famous as the scene of the miraculous crossing of the Israelites at the time of the Exodus (Ex., 14).—C.E.

Reductions of Paraguay, term applied to the communal mission villages established in South America by the Jesuit missionaries. Their purpose was to provide a settlement and refuge for the Indians of Paraguay and Brazil, who had been enslaved by the Spanish colonists as early as 1515. The first Reduction was established, 1606, in what is now southern Brazil, and by 1630 twelve more had been founded. The colonists opposed the move­ment, but Philip III of Spain aided the Jesuits with subsidies and legal measures. The Indians filled the communities and the venture grew so successful under the management of the Jesuits that the Spanish Government was no longer obliged to subsidize it. The site for a Reduction was chosen for its healthful climate and proximity to water­ways. The plan of the village was square, with the streets running in straight lines. In the center was the church, and nearby were the residence of the Fathers, and the cemetery. The Jesuits taught the young, managed the community, and fostered the common arts, agriculture, and cattle-raising. The main part of the “Christian Indian State,” as the Reductions were called, was formed by 30 or 32 Indians of Paraguay and Brazil, who had been en­slaved by the Spanish colonists as early as 1515. The first disastrous blow suffered by the Reductions occurred in 1750, when, in consequence of a treaty between Spain and Portugal, seven communities were compelled to move into new territory. The treaty was rescinded, 1761, but six years later Charles III of Spain dealt the fatal blow to the Reductions when he signed the edict exiling the Jesuits from Spanish colonies in America. The missions were allotted to the Franciscans but never regained their former state of excellence. After their destruction these were used in Masses of the Holy Ghost, usually celebrated at the opening of courts, legislative assemblies, and schools; Masses of the Holy Cross of Christ; and Masses of Apostles and Martyrs.

Refectory (Lat., refeicio, refresh), a room for eating; usually the dining-room of a monastery or conven­t.

Reformati, a reform branch of the Friars Minor of the Stricter Observance, organized by Francis of Jesi and Bernardine of Asti, and sanctioned by Clement VII, 1532. Statutes were drawn up containing their wealth, which was supposed to have been hidden by the Jesuits. Among the many Jesuits who labored in the Reductions were Frs. Macesta, Cataldiño, de Mendoza, Mazetta, Díaz, Ruiz, Baraza, and de Montoya. The last named is famous for his history of the Paraguay mission, and his vocabulary, grammar, and catechism in the Guaraní language.—C.E.

Reformation, a religious, social, and political upheaval (1517-1648), now frequently and more accurately called the Protestant Revolt or Revolution. The need of reform had long been felt when this revolution broke out, but the so-called Reformers, far from suppressing abuses, added religious discord to the prevalent evils.

Causes. The causes of the Reformation were: (1) the weakening of papal authority through the protracted residence at Avignon, the dissensions of the Great Schism of the West, and the worldliness of some popes; (2) the reservation of too many ecclesiastical appointments to the Roman Curia; (3) the opposition to papal authority on the part of some bishops who were in reality temporal princes rather than spiritual rulers; (4) the poverty, ignorance, or unfitness for their sacred calling of many of the lower clergy; (5) the wealth of some of the monasteries in Germany and England and the dissensions among their inmates; (6) the ignorance, superstition, and religious indifference prevalent among many Christians; (7) the tendency in civil governments to encroach upon the rights of the Church; (8) the social unrest consequent upon the disintegration of the feudal system; (9) the support given the new movement by the secular power, which was thus enabled to usurp the religious authority of the pope and to confiscate the property of the Church; (10) the revolts of pagan religious thought and practice; (11) the restlessness and love of material gain attendant upon the geographical discoveries; (12) the printing press so effectively used by the innovators to calumniate the Church and spread their views.

History. The author of the Protestant Revolution was the Augustinian priest, Martin Luther (1483-1546); the pretext was the abuses connected with indulgence preaching; the occasion, the preaching of indulgences in the neighborhood of Wittenberg by the Dominican Johann Tetzel. On 31 Oct., 1517, Luther challenged his contemporaries to a public debate on 95 theses or propositions which he had nailed to the church door at Wittenberg. These dealt with many points of Catholic doctrine and practise, particularly indulgences. The challenge led to vehement controversy in Germany. As Luther denied some points of Catholic teaching and fomented division in the state, papal and imperial authority intervened, after a few years, to obtain a retractation and to maintain civil concord. Their efforts were unsuccessful; as Luther was supported by the Elector of his native Saxony and by the ever-increasing number of his adherents. As the right conceded in theory to each individual, to find his own religion in the Bible, led to practise to religious anarchy, Luther placed his new religion under the supreme authority of the state. His followers and all other Reformers gradually received the name Protestants, from the protest issued by the Lutheran princes and cities against the Edict of Speyer (1529). At the Diet of Augsburg (1555) two denominations, the Catholic and the Lutheran, were officially recognized in Germany. By the Treaty of Westphalia (1648) recognition was extended to the Calvinists. Lutheranism spread into Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, whereas Zwinglianism was introduced in German-speaking Switzerland. At Geneva the desire to free themselves from the authority of the Catholic bishop led the inhabitants to submit to John Calvin. In England the sensual despot, Henry VIII, imposed a schism on the country; Edward VI introduced Protestantism; Mary Tudor, in hasty and harsh fashion, restored the Catholic religion; and Queen Elizabeth, through executions and confiscations, definitively established Anglicanism. In Scotland and the Netherlands the nobility were responsible for the success of Calvinism.

Results. The Protestant Reformation was a source of misery, discord, and civil war for the adherents of the Christian faith. It destroyed Christian unity, gave rise to a multitude of sects, and is responsible for the disintegration apparent today in non-Catholic Christian denominations. It introduced neither religious liberty, nor religious reform. It denied the existence of spiritual authority in its lawful possessor, the pope, and placed it in the hands of the civil rulers. It did not bring religious reform, as, according to Luther's own admission, immorality and corruption were more prevalent among his followers than in the Church of Rome. In politics it effected a prodigious transfer of property from the Church to the State and an enormous increase in the authority of the civil rulers. Through the state the civil authority despotism and tyranny, rather than democracy and liberty, gained from the movement. Genuine reform was introduced by the Catholic Church (See Counter-Reformation).—C.E.; Weber, A General History of the Christian Era, Wash., 1928; Smyth, The Reformation, Chi., 1922; Belloc, How the Reformation Happened, Lond., 1928.

Reformatories (Lat., reformare, to reshape), institutions in which children with criminal tendencies are educated towards normal law-abiding life. One of the first examples of such institutions was a hall of the hospital of St. Michael, founded in Rome in 1704 by Pope Clement XI. Over the door he inscribed its purpose: "For the correction of extreme physical and mental defectiveness or hopeless incorrigibility. Under the modern juvenile court procedure, the delinquent boy or girl is kept at home whenever possible, and efforts are there made to treat each case on an individual basis, so that the cause of the delinquency may be eliminated in character or surroundings, and at the same time valuable traits and powers may be developed. This change from a régime of strict institutional discipline to one of kindly sympathy, which of course does not mean laxity, is sound psychology. To be successful it requires untiring effort and constant supervision, and must be more than dull routine,
The rôle of religion in such work is everywhere admitted. If the delinquent can be led to a real participation in the life, doctrine, and sacraments of the Church, reformation is secure. (E. F. MacK.)

Reformed Churches, group of Swiss, Dutch, and some other churches, which were the direct outcome of the Protestant Reformation. There are three bodies in the United States. They are generally Calvinistic in doctrine. Their Heidelberg Catechism emphasizes the general comfort of redemption in Christ, while besides this the Westminster Catechism emphasizes the sovereignty of God. In government they differ from Presbyterian churches only in the names of church officers and some minor details. In 1926 in the United States there were 2390 ministers, 2682 churches, and 617,551 communicants.

Reformed Church in America, sect organized in the United States as early as 1623, as the Dutch Reformed Church. The present title was adopted in 1867. In doctrine they are strictly Calvinistic and accept the Apostles' and the Nicene creeds, the Belgic Confession, the Canons of the Synod of Dort, and the Heidelberg Catechism. They are presbyterian in matters of government. Four periodicals are published by them. Foreign missionary work is carried on in Arabia, India, China, and Japan, where in 1916 there were 29 stations, with 201 outstations; 141 missionaries, with 807 native helpers; 61 churches, with 6827 members; and 17 schools, with 1257 scholars. Connected with the Reformed Episcopal Church are 90 Christian Endeavor Societies, with 2250 members. In 1925 in the United States there were 70 ministers, 68 churches, and 8622 communicants.

Refuge, Cities of, towns which according to the Jewish law enjoyed the right of asylum, and to which anyone who had unintentionally killed another might flee and be protected from the "avenger of blood." In order to justify his claim to immunity the fugitive had to prove to the authorities that his deed was unpunited, and he became virtually a prisoner within the limits of the city to which he fled. The biblical cities of refuge were Cedes, Sichem, Hebron, Bosor, Ramoth in Galnaad, and Gaddar on the Jordan East of Jordan.

Régale, Droit de, ra-gäl, drwäld dém (Fr., law of royal prerogative), a right claimed, during the Middle Ages, by many sovereigns in France, England, and Germany, to collect the revenues of vacant ecclesiastical sees (Temporal Régale), and to appoint nominees to the benefices, even, at least in France, to those to which the care of souls was attached (Spiritual Régale). In 1673 Louis XIV pretended to extend the right to those French dioceses in which it was as yet unknown. Only two bishops, Pavillon of Alet and Caullet of Pamiers, both Jansenists, protested. They were sustained by Innocent XI, who wrote three letters to the king, but in vain. However, in 1682, the king consented to share the right of Spiritual Régale with the administrators of the vacant sees, who were to give the canonical investiture to the nominees of his choice; but at the same time he convoked the assembly of the clergy which endorsed his views. Innocent XI condemned the Régale once more, as did Alexander VIII, and Innocent XII, but to no avail; and the practice continued until the French Revolution. The efforts of Napoleon I to revive it were frustrated by his own downfall.—C.E. (F.P.B.)

Regali solio fortis Iberire, or Glory of Iberia's Throne!, hymn for Vespers and Lauds on the feast of St. Hermengild, 13 April. It was written by Pope Urban VIII (1568-1644) and has four translations; the English title given is by E. Caswall.—Britt.

Regeneration, dogmatically, the rebirth by which we become sons of God (John, 3), identified with initial justification and sanctifying grace. It is effected by the reception or desire of Baptism, the sacrament of regeneration (Tit., 3), and is sealed by the baptismal character which remains even after a death-bringing, or mortal, sin. Contrast this with... the biological notion, i.e., repair of living tissue; with the metaphorical notion of efflorescence; with the non-Christian idea of aspiration to new life, or release through metempsychosis; with the Pietistic idea of experience of conversion and of moral righteousness; with the old Protestant notion of Divine dissimulation upon our sinfulness; with the Ritschlian notion of reconciliation following forgiveness. Regeneration may also signify, in a cosmic sense, renewal of the Stoic world-cycle; and, in Christian eschatology, the resurrection of the dead (Matt., 19).—C.E. (F.B.)

Regesta, Papal (Lat., regere, to inscribe), the copies, generally entered by the papal chancery in special registry volumes, of papal correspondence and official documents, both ancient and modern. This custom probably antedates Constantine, and can be positively proved for the 4th century and onwards, although nearly all the copies up to the end of the 12th century have disappeared. The earlier books of record were called also commentarii, and the archive in which they were kept, chartes. Both paper and parchment were used. The most important fragments of the various periods here are: about 850 letters of the regesta of Gregory I (590-604); some letters of John VIII (872-882), 55 of which are in the British Museum, together with correspondence of six other popes; about 70 letters from the regesta of Adrian IV (1154-59) and several others, at Cambridge; 361 letters of Gregory VII (1073-85), constituting, however, and merely an extract of the original regesta, in the Vatican archives. Other correspondence extant includes 38 letters of the antipope Anacletus II (1130-38). Many of the above are not actual originals, which fact has been discerned by the science of diplomatics (q.v.). The regesta generally are of first historical importance, and have been published in three great collections, chief among which is that of Jaffe, Leipzig, 1888 (2nd edition).—C.E.

Regina, Archdiocese of, Saskatchewan, Canada, comprises the southern part of the Province of Saskatchewan lying between the International Boundary line and the line separating townships 30 and 31 of the Lewis Strip. Diocese: 1910: archiepiscopal, 1915; suffragans: Prince Albert and Saskatoon, and St. Peter's Abbey, Muenster. Archbishop: Olivier Elzéar Mathieu (1911), churches, 311; priests, secular, 95; priests, regular, 67; colleges, 2; schools and academies, 31; Indian schools, 3; institutions, 8; Catholics, 40,000.

Regina coeli laetare, alleluia, or Joy to thee, O Queen of heaven! Alleluia, antiphon of Our Lady said, standing, instead of the Angelus, and also after the Divine Office, from Compline on Holy Saturday until None of the Saturday after Pentecost, inclusively. The indulgences are the same as for the Angelus. It may be found in 14th-century manuscripts, but it is not known who the author was. There are 10 translations. The English title given is by E. Caswall.—C.E.; Britt.

Regis superni nuntia, or God's Messenger, Theresa, hymn for Vespers and Matins on 15 Oct., feast of St. Theresa. It was written by Pope Urban VIII (1608-1644) and has four translations; the English title given is by D. Donahoe.—Britt.

Regulars, Parochial, five distinct books, in which the parish priest is required to record respectively the baptisms, confirmations, and marriages that take place in his parish (except marriages of conscience, which are recorded in the secret archives of chancery), deaths among his people, and, as far as possible, the actual spiritual condition of his parish. At the end of the year, authentic copies of these registers, excepting the last, should be sent to the diocesan chancery. Annotations of subsequent confirmation, marriage, reception of subdiocese, or solemn religious profession, must be made alongside the record of baptism in the baptismal register and always transcribed into certificates of baptism (can. 470).—C.E.; P.C. Augustine; Ayrihac, Constitution of the Church, N. Y., 1925.

Regular Juris (Lat., rules of law), in general, rules of legal interpretation. In a more specific sense, regular juris are certain legal axioms found in the Decretals of Gregory IX and the Decretals of Boniface VIII. There are 99 in all, referred to as R.J. Some instances will make the matter clear. "Once bad, always presumed to be bad." (9); this applies only in the same crime, e.g., if a man has been proven a perjurer once, he is excluded from giving testimony again, but he would not be considered a homicide from the fact that he was a perjurer. "There is no injury done to one who knowingly and freely consents." (27); this suggests that no one is injured if he knowingly and willingly gives up a right which he is allowed to surrender, but does not apply in case he is morally incapable of giving it up.—C.E. (P.J.L.)

Regular Baptists, a group of Baptist associations all of whom claim to be the original English Baptists before the distinction between Calvinistic or Particular and Arminian or General became prominent. Found for the most part in North Carolina, Virginia, Tennessee, Kentucky, and adjoining states, they are in general sympathy with the United Baptists, and Duck River and kindred associations of Baptists. In doctrine the Regular Baptists are in accord with the United Baptists (q.v.). "They are an easy people to live with and willing to give up a right which he is allowed to surrender, but does not apply in case he is morally incapable of giving it up."—C.E. (P.J.L.)

Regular Canons, See Canons and Canonesses Regular.

Regular Clerks of the Congregation of St. Paul (Barnabites), founded in Milan, 1530, by St. Anthony Mary Zaccaria, Barthelemy Ferrari, and Jacopo Moriglia, with the special object of reviving zeal among the clergy. They preach, catechize, shrive, give missions, administer the sacraments, and educate the young in Italy, Austria, France, Czechoslovakia, Belgium, Malta, China, and Brazil. The order has 35 houses, 400 religious, and 7 provinces.—C.E., II, 302.

Regulars (Lat., regula, rule), in the proper, canonical sense of the word, religious men professed of the solemn vows, or the professed of simple vows in an order in which solemn vows are made, e.g., in the Society of Jesus. In its less restricted and more general usage the word is applied to all religious men, both of orders and congregations; hence it is frequently used to designate priests who are also religious and thus bound by rule, in contradistinction to diocesan or secular clergy united by no rule. When used in the phrase "Clerks Regular," the word refers to those religious, as the Theatines and the Jesuits, who are not monks in the proper use of the term, to distinguish them from the members of the older monastic orders, as the Benedictines.—C.E.

Reifenstuel, JOHANN GEORG (1641-1703), canonist, b. Kaltenbrunn, Bavaria; d. Freising. He was a member of the Franciscan (Reformed) Order, and was chosen definitor of his province. He taught philosophy at Freising, Landshut, and Munich, and canon law at Freising. His works on moral theology and canon law给他 first rank among the canonists of his time, and have gone through numerous editions, with additions by other authors.—C.E.

Reims, city in northern France. Built on the site of Durcorcorum, the capital of the Remi, it was evangelized by St. Sixtus and Sinicius, who founded the bishopric in the 3rd century. It is important in history as the scene of the baptism of Clovis the Frank, by the bishop St. Remigius, in 496. From the 10th century, the archbishops enjoyed the title of count and the privilege of coinage, and of the church, and in 999 they obtained their important prerogative, the coronation of the kings, which they held until the time of Charles X. The Cathedral of Notre Dame, a masterpiece of Gothic architecture, was completed in 100 years (1211-1311). In it took place the coronation of Charles VII (1429), brought about in 100 years (1211-1311), and in it took place the coronation of Charles VII (1429) brought about by St. Joan of Arc. The city is now the seat of an archdiocese having a Catholic population of 53,350 and 693 churches.

Reincarnation. See Metempsychosis.

Relativism, general term designed to fit any doctrine which denies the existence of absolute values. Things exist which have absolute values, e.g., ethical principles and truths. These things stand independently of the operations of intellect and will, because they are ultimately founded in the nature of God. In the universe they should serve as absolute standards for intellect and will, for voluntary operations. In disposing of these absolute values, relativism, in any form, leads logically to scepticism and liberalism. Relativism takes a multitude of forms, the most pernicious being Ethical Relativism which upholds the relative nature of the moral code. Relativism of Truth claims that truth is not something absolute but "relative to the faculty of which it is the product." Relativism of Knowledge confesses the inability of human concept to approach to anything closer than "correspondence or symbolic representation of the reality." Relativism of Reality groops feitfully in search of a term to which it might relate Reality itself.—C.E.

Relic (Lat. relinitus, remaining), an object connected with a saint. It may be the whole or a part of the saint's body, or something the saint has touched, e.g., a garment. Such objects are venerated with the approbation of the Church (Council of Trent, Sess. XXV) because, though all the members of the Church are considered, and from the time of the Apostles are addressed, as "saints," those who practise heroic virtue or die for the Faith are honored by the Church as exceptionally holy, merit the veneration of the faithful. This is paid by special respect for their remains as well as imitation of their virtues. Their relics are therefore enshrined on altars, carried in processions, and used to obtain cures and other favors.—C.E.; O'Brien, A History of the Mass, N.Y., 1882. (C. J. P.)

Relief (It., rilievo), the projection of a figure or series of figures above or below a surface. It is one of the earliest forms of sculpture, and very probably antedates the introduction of sculpture in the round. Bas-relief (basso-rilievo), or low relief, is a form of relief which projects from a flat surface apparently to a greater degree than is actually the case; it is distinguished from high relief (alto-rilievo), and from demi-relief (mezzo-rilievo). The lowest of all, which scarcely rises from the surface, is called depressed or flattened relief (rilievo-stiacciato). Hollow relief (cavo-rilievo) is a concave form on which the highest part of the outline is no higher than the surface level. It was practised largely by the Egyptians, whose works are hence known by the Greek derivative koiwaglyphs (hollow carvings), and is often used tinted, as in Egyptian, Assyrian, and Greek art; in Gothic and Renaissance art it was customary to tint wood, terra-cotta, and stucco, but not marble or stone; an example of tinting is the "Annunciation" of Andrea della Robbia. It is particularly well adapted to the human figure, especially in action, upon frizees, and to a portrait of a succession of scenes, as in the bronze doors of various Italian baptisteries. As a purely Christian and Catholic form of art, it ranks high, reaching its fullest development in Florence in the baptistry doors, by Ghiberti, and the marble pulpit of Santa Croce, by Benedetto da Majano. Besides della Robbia's "Bambini" in the Hospital of the Innocents, Florence (for illustration see BABMINO), Donatello's high and low reliefs are admirable, among the best examples of which is the "Head of St. John presented to Herod." The finest example extant of low relief is that of the frieze around the Pantaloon in the Pammachio, which may be seen in the British Museum, Marble, bronze, and terra-cotta are used exclusively in the larger reliefs; in the smaller reliefs precious stones and metals, and ivory, stucco, wood, and enamel are used.

Religion (Lat. religare, to recover, or reliare, to bind), in its widest sense the union of man with God. Objectively, it consists in doctrines and precepts by which man seeks to bind about this union. Religion is true when its doctrines and precepts are either dictated by right reason or revealed by God; if the former, it is called natural religion, if the latter, supernatural religion. Religion is false if, when claiming to be revealed, it is unable to show a divine guarantee, or when its dogmas and practises sin against right reason and conscience.
Subjectively, religion is the attitude of the man who rules his thoughts, words, and actions according to right reason and revelation. In this latter sense religion is a special virtue allied to justice, because it prompts man to render to God what is due Him by strict right from His rational creatures. As such, religion is a strict obligation incumbent on every man. It is also the means by which man is to work out his final destiny.—C.E.; Schanz, A Christian Apology; The History of Religions, St. L., 1910; Ladd, The Philosophy of Religion, N. Y., 1905; Brunsmann-Preuss, Fundamental Theology, St. L., 1928.

RELIGION, VIRTUE OF. Religion is a moral virtue by which we render to God due honor and worship. We say that it is a moral virtue because acts of religion do not have, as their direct object, God, but rather the reverence which is due God. These acts of worship deal directly with the means which tend towards man’s final and last end, namely, God’s reverence and worship. We say moreover that religion is a virtue by which we render to God due worship, worship, i.e., by which we acknowledge God as the supreme Being, the Creator, the uncreated, infinitely perfect Being. Finally, we render to God due worship, i.e., in so far as man, a finite, created being, can render worship to the infinitely perfect and eternal Creator. That man must exercise this virtue of religion is the teaching of the First Commandment: “I am the Lord thy God. . . Thou shalt not have strange gods before me” (Ex., 20). The various acts of worship which man is capable of offering to God are prayer, sacrifice, vows, oaths, and adoration. The sins against this virtue are blasphemy, idolatry, divination, tempting God, superstition, and simony.—C.E.

Religion and Science. Much has been said and written about the so-called conflict between religion and science, as though the one were a contradiction or denial of the other. This conflict is for the most part imaginary. Religion and science lie in different provinces and each has its own legitimate field; the former deals mostly with the world of unseen realities which science cannot know, the latter mostly with the world of sense and matter about which religion has little to say. God is the source of both in so far as they are true, hence there can be no real contradiction between them. Conflict arises only when the scientist tries to turn theologian, or the theologian scientist. In other words, whatever conflict there is, it is not between religion and science, but between theologian and scientist when either or both overstep the limits of their respective fields in interpreting certain facts or in drawing certain conclusions from facts. “The scientist studies phenomena and their laws. The moment he abandons secondary causes to occupy himself with first and final causes he is false to his method and must become involved in an inextricable labyrinth; but so long as he is content to confine himself to matter and sequences of material phenomena there is little danger of unfriendly encounter between himself and the theologian who understands his business” (Spalding, Lectures and Discourses, p. 54). Likewise the theologian as long as he remains within his territory of revealed doctrine is not likely to bring upon himself the attacks of scientists. It is when he engages in speculation on matters about which religion should have nothing to say that he occasions what is so wrongly called the conflict between religion and science. The remedy or prevention lies in ascertaining what religion really teaches and what science really proves and in distinguishing this knowledge carefully from the speculations of some theologians on the one hand or the opinions of some men of science on the other. The truly great in either field are witnesses to the fact that true science and true religion are not at war with one another.—Walsh, The Popes and Science, N. Y., 1913; Kneller, Christianity and the Leaders of Modern Science, St. L., 1911. (L. A. A.)

Religious Congregation for the Affairs of, the Congregation that attends to all matters which concern religious orders and their members, bound by simple or solemn vows, and also secular third orders. The affairs may be questions arising between bishops and religious or between religious themselves, or cases in which a religious is the complainant or defendant. Dispensations for religious from the common law are also in the power of this Congregation.—See BISHOPS AND REGULARS, CONGREGATION OF.—C.E., XIII, 142. (ED.)

Religious Hospitalers of St. Joseph, founded, 1636, by Marie de la Ferre, and dedicated to the service of the poor. The society has 24 houses, including hospitals and clinics in France and Belgium, and in the United States and Canada hospitals and orphanages. The mother-house is at La Flèche; religious total (approximately) 1000.—C.E., VII, 477.

Religious Life, the state of men who profess to aim at the perfection of Christian charity in the bosom of the Church, by the three perpetual vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. The religious life pointed out to us by the Evangelical counsels is a life of charity and of union with God, and the great means it employs to this end are freedom and detachment from everything that could in any manner prevent or impair that union. From another point of view it is a devotion, a special consecration to Christ and God, to whom every Christian acknowledges that he belongs. Christian virgins were the first to profess a life distinguished from the ordinary, by its tendency to perfection; continence, and often the renunciation of riches, attached them especially to Christ. Shortly after them, appeared the “confessors” who also made profession of chastity and sometimes of poverty. In the 3rd century we find the first distinct traces of the kind of life in which the religious profession becomes by degrees perfected and brought under rule, that of the monks. The Gospel clearly states virginity and continence as the means, and charity as the end, of all religious life. Persecutions necessitated retirement and a first form of life entirely directed towards personal sanctification; community life produced obedience; the inconveniences caused by frequent changes of residence suggested the vow of stability; the excessive multiplication and diversity of religious institutes called for the intervention of the sovereign pontiff and his express approbation of rules; the needs of soul and body grafted the practise of corporal and spiritual works of mercy upon personal sanctification, and joined the reception of Holy Orders to religious profession; and the exigencies and difficulties of modern times caused the making of simple vows antecedent to, or in substitution for, solemn vows. Some examples of the regular religious life may be seen among the Canons Regular, the mendicant orders, the military orders, the hospital orders, the Clerks Regular, the Eastern orders, those orders founded principally for teaching, as the Christian Brothers, and innumerable congregations of nuns.—C.E.

Religious of Notre Dame de Sion, a religious congregation founded by the brothers Marie-Théodore and Marie-Alphonse Ratisbonne in Paris, 1843, for the conversion of the Jews and the education of the young. The nuns receive their spiritual guidance from the priests of Notre Dame de Sion, a congregation of secular priests. The congregation has 46 houses, including schools and orphanages in France, Belgium, Italy, Austria, Hungary, Rumania, Bulgaria, Turkey, Palestine, Egypt, Tunis, England, Australia, Canada, Brazil, Costa Rica, and the United States. The mother-house is in Paris; religious total over 2000. —C.E., XI, 128.

Religious of Our Lady of Charity, a branch of the order of “Our Lady of Charity of the Refuge,” founded by St. John Eudes at Caen, France, 1641; the government of the order was centralized by Mother Mary Pelletier, who established a mother-house at Angers, 1855, with the approval of the Holy See and under the title of the present Institute. The Good Shepherd is a cloistered order and follows the Rule of St. Augustine. The constitution, borrowed in great part from those given by St. Francis de Sales to the Visitation Nuns, are modified to suit the nature of the work, which is to provide a shelter for girls and women of dissolute habits who wish to do penance and lead Christian lives; these are divided into the three distinct classes of “penitents,” “Magdalens,” and “preservates.” To the three ordinary vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, the religious oblige them­selves to strive for Christian perfection by the observance of the evangelical counsels. This obligation is assumed by the taking of the public vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. It is a permanent manner of life in which religious oblige themselves to strive for Christian perfection by the observance of the evangelical counsels. This obligation is assumed by the taking of the public vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. It is a permanent manner of life, because once entered upon it cannot be renounced except for grave reasons, and then only with consent of competent superiors. As it exists today, the religious state includes some form of community life, obedience to a rule and constitution, submission to a superior. Essentially, that is in the observance of poverty, chastity, and obedience, the religious state was instituted by Christ, both by His example and the evangelical counsels; accidentally, that is in the degree and manner of observing poverty and under the title of a hermit of dissolute habits who wish to do penance and lead Christian lives; these are divided into the three distinct classes of “penitents,” “Magdalens,” and “preservates.” To the three ordinary vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, the religious oblige themselves to strive for Christian perfection by the observance of the evangelical counsels. Religious of Perpetual Adoration (Belgium), an institute founded at Brussels, 1857, by Anna de Meeus, with the object of reviving faith in the Real Presence. Retreats are conducted by the religious and instruction given to children and converts, but the special work of the community is the direction of the Association of Perpetual Adoration and Work for Poor Churches (in America, popularly known as the “Tabernacle Society”), a world-wide organization, having its center in Rome, enjoying fullest papal approbation and enriched with many indulgences and spiritual favors. Erected an archassociation, 1853, it is subordinate in government to the Institute as a religious body, though one with it in name and object. The Institute has 10 houses, each a center of the association, in Rome, Belgium, Holland, England, and the United States. The mother-house is at Watermael, Belgium; total membership is 280.—C.E., XI, 697.

This obligation is assumed by the taking of the public vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. It is a permanent manner of life, because once entered upon it cannot be renounced except for grave reasons, and then only with consent of competent superiors. It is a permanent manner of life, because once entered upon it cannot be renounced except for grave reasons, and then only with consent of competent superiors. As it exists today, the religious state includes some form of community life, obedience to a rule and constitution, submission to a superior. Essentially, that is in the observance of poverty, chastity, and obedience, the religious state was instituted by Christ, both by His example and the evangelical counsels; accidentally, that is in the degree and manner of observing poverty and under the title of a hermit of dissolute habits who wish to do penance and lead Christian lives; these are divided into the three distinct classes of “penitents,” “Magdalens,” and “preservates.”

Reliquary, a vessel intended to contain and expose a sacred relic. It often resembles a small ostensorium. In some religious orders, the reliquary is large and sometimes inmovable, containing many relics. There is a special blessing in the Ritual for reliquaries. —C.E.

Remigius, Saint, apostle of the Franks (437-553), Abp. of Reims, b. Cerny-en-Laonnais, France; d. Reims. He studied literature at Reims, and when still a layman was elected Bp. of Reims, 459, and made his chief aim the propagation of Christianity among the Franks; he brought about the conversion of King Clovis, whom he baptized, 496. He occupied the see 94 years. He established bishoprics, consecrated bishops, and combated Arianism. His relics are in the Abbey Remission of Sin, true, actual forgiveness of sin. With remission of mortal sin the eternal punishment due to it is also pardoned, but not all venial sins or temporal punishments are taken away. Unlimited power of remitting sin was promised and conferred upon the Apostles and their successors by Jesus Christ (Matt., 16 and 18; John, 20). This power is exercised in the Sacrament of Penance (q.v.). For a valid exercise of this power the order of priesthood and proper jurisdiction are required. This jurisdiction is vested in its plenitude in the pope, from whom all bishops and priests in the entire Church receive their jurisdiction. Perfect contrition, with the desire of the Sacrament, is another means of remitting mortal sin. Venial sins can also be remitted, provided sorrow for them be present, by devout attendance at Holy Mass, penitential exercises, charitable works, prayers, etc. See JUSTIFICATION; CONTRITION.—Pohle-Preuss, The Sacraments; A Dogmatic Treatise, III, St. L., 1924. (D. M.)

Remusat, Anne Madeleine, Venerable, Nuns of (1606-1730). b. Marseilles, France; d. there. She entered a convent of the Visitation (1704), was withdrawn by her parents (1709), reentered (1711), and was professed (1713). Receiving a revelation concerning the Sacred Heart (1719), she was the means of spreading this devotion through many countries. Her influence caused Bp. Henri Belusacne to establish the Association of Perpetual Adoration of the Sacred Heart at Marseilles, and to institute a feast of the Sacred Heart. She endured great sufferings for the salvation of souls during her whole life. Declared Venerable, 24 Dec., 1891, by Leo XIII.—C.E.

classics, nor did she oppose the return to the cult of form and beauty. Her opposition was directed against the return to the pagan spirit with its rationalism, scepticism, and contempt for revealed religion.—C.E.; Symonds, Renaissance in Italy, N. Renaissance (or Neo-classic) Architecture, a transitional style, which originated in the 15th century in Italy and was copied nearly a century later by France, Germany, and Spain. It is characterized by finely wrought arabesques, strings and cornices of classic profile, delicate pilasters and pediments, and a great profusion of surface color and ornament. Among its exponents were Brunelleschi, da Vinci, and Cellini. Its finest examples are St. Peter's and St. John Lateran, Rome; and the Louvre, Paris.

Renan, Joseph Ernest (1823-93), philosopher, critic, and Orientalist, b. Tréguier, France; d. Paris. His early training was received from his mother and sister, and in the seminary of his village. He decided to enter the priesthood, and to that end attended seminars in Paris and Issy. His interest in Oriental philology and early Christianity led him to adopt the scepticism and rationalism of the Kantian philosophers, and in 1845 he left the seminary. The French government sent him on a scientific mission to Palestine where he wrote a life of Christ which was abhorrent to all Christians, regardless of sect. This was followed by an equally objectionable life of St. Paul. These, together with monographs on Oriental studies, earned him renown as stylist rather than historian, and betrayed the Modernistic errors in his thought.

René Goupil, Blessed, martyr (1607-42), b. France; d. New York. Unable to join the Society of Jesus regularly, he volunteered his missionary services in Canada. He became the disciple and companion of Blessed Isaac Jogues and remained with him until death. Goupil accompanied him to the Huron Mission, was captured by the Iroquois, suffered horrible tortures, and was killed. Before his death he pronounced the religious vows of the society in the presence of Fr. Jogues. Beatiied, 21 June, 1925.—C.E., VI, 684.

Reni, rē’né, GUIDO (1575-1642), painter, b. near Bologna, Italy; d. Bologna. He studied with the Carracci, and was constantly employed in decorating churches and palaces in Rome. Good draughtsmanship and admirable coloring made him one of the most popular artists of his day. His masterpiece is the "Aurora" painted on the ceiling of the Rospigliosi palace in Rome. The so-called "Beatrice Cenci" of the Barberini palace, formerly attributed to him, is now thought to be the work of another.—C.E.

Reconstructions, ordinations which were considered null and void and hence repeated, because they were administered by an heretical, a schismatical, or a deposed bishop, or even by a bishop in proper standing, if there was some defect in conferring orders. An ordination by an heretical or schismatical bishop is valid provided the essentials of the Sacrament of Orders are observed in regard to matter and form and requisite intention.—C.E.;Tickner, Holy Orders. (B. R. M.)

Reparation (Lat., reparare, to repair), term used in canon law in reference to the reparation of churches; in asceticism, to express the prayers, actions, or sufferings offered to God to make good the evil done by men, particularly on certain occasions of excess, e.g., Mardi Gras, Shrove tide, and other times of jubilee rejoicing. It is identified with the devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, as the practice of members of the third degree of the Apostleship of Prayer, who offer Holy Communion to repair irreverence, strid, ingratitude toward Our Lord in this Sacrament.—C.E.

Repository, a chapel or side-altar of repose in which a Sacred Host consecrated on Holy Thursday is kept until Good Friday.—C.E. (J. F. S)

Reprobae (a Calvinistic term), rejected by God, beyond pardon or redemption; the opposite of the "elect," those we assume is called that they are predestined to salvation. In Catholic usage, only one who dies impenitent is reprobate, and of that state only God is judge. (od.)

Requiem (Lat., rest), Mass of Mass celebrated for the dead, deriving its name from the first word of the Introit. It is also called Black Mass, from the color of the vestments used. It differs from other Masses by the omission of the Gloria Patri and the Gloria in Excelsis. It has a Sequence, the Dies Irae; and a special Preface. Instead of "misericors nobis" at the Agnus Dei, the priest says "dona eis requiem." The first of the three prayers before the Communion is omitted. Instead of "te, missa est," is said "Requiescat in pace"; no blessing is given.—C.E.; Wuest, tr. Mullaney, Matters Liturgica, N. Y., 1926. (C. J. D.)

Reredos or Altar-piece, screen of stone or wood at the back of the altar, usually ornamented with panels, niches, statues, buttresses, and other decorations and often painted in brilliant colors. The side which faces the nave is called the "retable" and the other side, the "counter-retable." It sometimes extends across the whole breadth of the church and reaches nearly to the ceiling. Its use dates from the 12th century, when only the altar of relics had a reredos, but in the 14th century the main altar was provided with one and it became an elaborate structure, usually conforming to the architecture of the church. It is connected with the altar by means of a predella or altar step. In medieval times it was customary in some places to keep the Blessed Sacrament in a small cupboard arranged in the reredos.

Rerum Creator optime, or WHO MADEST ALL AND DOST CONTROL, hymn for Wednesday at Matins; used in canon law in reference to the reparation of actions, or sufferings offered to God to make good the evil done by men, particularly on certain occasions of excess, e.g., Mardi Gras, Shrove tide, and other times of jubilee rejoicing. It is identified with the devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, as the practice of members of the third degree of the Apostleship of Prayer, who offer Holy Communion to repair irreverence, strid, ingratitude toward Our Lord in this Sacrament.—C.E.; Britt.
Rerum Novarum, the title words of the Encyclical issued by Leo XIII, 15 May, 1891, on the condition of labor. The Encyclical applies the old doctrines of traditional teaching concerning rights and duties of property and the proper relation of employer and employee to modern labor conditions. It refutes the false theories of the Socialists and defends the rights of private ownership. The true remedy it finds in the combined action of the Church, the State, the employer, and the employee. The Church being interested chiefly in the religious and moral aspects of social questions, the State has the duty and the right to intervene on behalf of justice and of social and individual well-being. Employers and workers it advises to organize into both mixed and separate associations for mutual and for self protection. The details set forth in the Encyclical reach practically all the principal problems and relations of industrial and social life. Thoughtful men look upon Leo XIII’s Encyclical as the most fruitful and effective document on industrial justice thus far pronounced.—C.E.; The Great Encyclical Letters of Pope Leo XIII, ed. Wynne, N. Y., 1903.

Rescripts (Lat., rescribere, to write back), written answers by the pope, generally through curial channels, to petitions, reports, or queries. Lesser decisions and grants are made in these simplest of papal documents. In dispensations the rescript sometimes empowers the local bishops to dispense, at other times it contains a direct dispensation.—C.E.; Woywod; P.C. Augustine.

Reservation (Lat., reservatio, a retaining). (1) The keeping of the Blessed Sacrament in the tabernacle or in some other fitting place, as Viaticum for the dying and as an object of devotion for the faithful. This custom existed in the Church from the first centuries. (2) The act by which an ecclesiastical superior withholds from his inferiors the power to absolve from certain sins or censures.—C.E.; Kelly, The Jurisdiction of the Confessor, Wash., 1927.

Reserved cases, sins or censures, the right to absolve from which is restricted to certain confessors or ecclesiastical superiors. These cases are divided into papal, episcopal, and religious, in so far as the power to absolve from them is confined (under ordinary circumstances, at least) to the pope, a bishop, or a religious superior respectively. C.E.; P.C. Augustine.

Residence, Ecclesiastical, a term applied to the obligation of a pastor to live within his parish. Its purpose is to guarantee the service and fulfillment of one's pastoral duties. The bishop is also obliged to personal residence in his diocese, even though he has a coadjutor bishop. If a pastor lives outside of his parish, or a bishop outside of his episcopal city, he does so only by dispensation. Two months' vacation are allowed a pastor each year; bishops, two or at most three months. To be absent from his parish for more than a week, a pastor, besides a good reason, must have the written permission of his bishop. A substitute, approved by the ordinary, must be provided during the pastor's absence. If this substitute is a religious, the approval of the bishop and his religious superior is required.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine.

Response, Responsory (Lat., respondere, to answer). (1) An answer. (2) A short phrase or sentence recited by choir or congregation in answer to preceding verse. Versicle and response are drawn in most cases from the Psalms. They are of very early Christian use, e.g., Et cum spiritu tuo, or Beo gratia. (3) A series of verses and responses recited or chanted in the Divine Office between the Lessons of Matins and after the Little Chapters of the other Canonical Hours. In the latter case it is called Short Response or Responsory. The Responsory is based upon the responsorial form of psalmody in which a soloist chanted the verses, after each of which the choir or congregation repeated a verse, a half-verse or acclamation, e.g., “Alleluia,” as a refrain. The Invitatory (Ps. 94), and the Graduals of the Mass are types of responsorial psalms. In structure the Responsory consists of the responsory, properly so called, the verse, and the doxology. In content it is frequently closely connected in thought with the preceding verse and is composed of psalms, verses, or other portions of Scripture, or sometimes is from the feast of the day.—C.E.

Restitution (Lat., restitutio, to give back), the returning of something that has been unjustly taken from another, or of its equivalent; also the indemnification of another for unjust damages done to his person or reputation or property. One who has been guilty of a serious act of injustice that demands restitution cannot obtain the pardon of his sins unless he makes restitution, or at least has a sincere intention of doing so when, and as far as, he is able.—C.E.; Koch-Preuss.

Resurrection, The, Our Lord's way of proving Himself before raising Lazarus from death: “I am the Resurrection and the Life” (John, 11). (m.)

Resurrection of Christ, the Gospel miracle, related by the four Evangelists, of Christ's return to life. By His own power He reunited His body and soul, and issued alive from the sealed and guarded tomb, after His dead body had reposéd therein from Friday evening until Sunday morning. This fact was predicted by Christ Himself, and offered by Him as the chief sign or proof of His Divine mission and Divinity. The Apostles after Him made it the cardinal point in their teaching, on which hinged the value of the Christian faith. St. Paul says: “And if Christ be not risen again, then is our preaching vain: and your faith is also vain” (1 Cor., 15). Among the many masters who have represented this subject in art are: Aldegrever, Baldovinetti, Bellini, Annibale and Agostino Carracci, Contarini, Correggio, El Greco, Fra Angelico, Ghirlandajo, Murillo, Palma, Perugino, Pinturicchio, Pontormo, Rubens, San Sepolcro, Timoteo, Titian, Tintoretto, Van de Velde, Veronese, and Vivarini.—C.E.; Pohle-Preuss, Chrisology, St. L., 1922.

(A. C. K.)

Resurrection of Mankind, the universal return to life of all the members of the human race, effected shortly before the last judgment by God’s omnipotence, when each individual human soul will be permanently reunited with the identical body with which it was united on earth. The Creed expresses this dogma in the words, “resurrection of the body.”—Pohle-Preuss, Eschatology, St. L., 1924; Prat, tr. Stoddard, The Theology of St. Paul, N. Y., 1926; Arendzen, What Becomes of the Dead?, Lond., 1925. (A. C. K.)

Retable, a shelf or panel of wood, stone, terracotta, or silver, raised above the rear of an altar to support lights, ornaments, etc. It is often richly ornamented and depicts sacred scenes in painting or bas-relief. The face of the piece is usually called the retablo, the back known as the counter-retablo.

Retreat (Lat., retractere, to withdraw), withdrawal from the usual surroundings and bustle of life; distractions to a place set apart for solitude, meditation, self-examination, and amendment of life. Under a competent director the retreatants follow certain spiritual exercises, like those of St. Ignatius, which enable one to grasp more clearly the simple truths of religion about God and man’s relations with Him, sin and its penalties, the following of Christ, and a rule of life, in order to rise above the thought of doing evil and to aim at a higher standard of life. Within the past 30 years a great number of places of retreat for men and women have been provided in every English-speaking country, some of them in religious houses, but for men mostly in houses set apart distinctly for this purpose. These retreats usually last only a few days, but those who have leisure may spend a longer time. Priests and religious usually make a retreat every year for a week or eight days.—C.E.; Mather, Mother Mary, A Retreat Under the Guidance of Saint Teresa, Lond., 1929; Longhaye and Wolferstan, An Eight Days’ Retreat, N. Y., 1928; The Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius Loyola, with commentary by Rickaby, N. Y., 1923. (Ed.)

Retz, Jean François Paul Gondi, Cardinal de (1614-79), Abp. of Paris; b. Château of Montmirail; d. Paris. Destined for the Church, he acquired a solid education, studying sacred and profane literature; his taste, however, inclined toward Republicanism and the rôle of conspirator. From 1638-41 he took part in the plots of the Count de Soissons against Richelieu, but after the death of the former, devoted himself to an ecclesiastical career, and in 1644 was consecrated at Notre Dame, receiving the title of Abp. of Corinth. His popularity in Paris and his activity in the movement of the so-called Fronde against Mazarin, brought down upon him the hostility of the latter. When made cardinal, 1651, he promised fidelity to the royal family, but his opposition to Mazarin ended only with the latter’s death. He played an active part in the quarrels between Louis XIV and Rome, and the conclaves which elected Clement IX and X. A politician rather than a churchman, his career was characterized by intrigue, intrigue, and adventure.—C.E.

Revelation (Lat., re, back; rubrum, red), a drawing aside of the veil, disclosing what is hidden, as the unveiling of a statue. Divine revelation discloses things about God which otherwise we should not know, or know imperfectly only. Revelation is the basis of supernatural religion, of knowledge of God and divine things which is above unaided reason, or which, though attainable by reason, becomes known in a way that is outside the course of nature. Christ affirmed: “All things are delivered to Me by My Father. And no one knoweth who the Son is, but the Father: and who the Father is, but the Son and to whom the Son will reveal Himself” (Luke, 10). Christ, in His own person, was a revelation of God to mankind: “I am the Way, and the Truth, and the Life. No man cometh to the Father, but by Me . . . he that seeth Me, seeth the Father also” (John, 14). Christ emphasizes the fact that He is a revealer of Divine truth when He says: “My doctrine is not Mine, but His that sent Me” (John, 7). Christ is both God and man. As man, He was the offspring of His Eternal Father; as God, He and the Father are equal in all things. In order that His doctrine might be accepted as Divine revelation, He confirmed it by Divine sanction: “the works themselves which I do, give testimony of Me, that the Father hath sent Me” (John, 5). Hence St. Paul declared: “For I give you to understand, brethren, that the gospel which was preached by me is not according to man; for neither did I receive it of man; nor did I learn it but by the revelation of Jesus Christ” (Gal., 1).

From the beginning God revealed Himself to our first parents; later on to the patriarchs, to Moses, and to the Prophets; lastly through His only-begotten Son, Jesus Christ, and the Apostles, this, the Christian revelation, is the last, under which all men must work out their salvation until the end of time.—C.E.; Wilmers, Handbook of the Christian Religion, N. Y., 1921; Brunsmann-Preuss, Fundamental Theology, St. L., 1928. (M. J. S.; L. A. A.)

Revelation, Book of, Protestant name for the Apocalypse.

Revelations, Private, those manifestations of secrets which are made to a particular person. There are three kinds: natural, which result from natural causes; diabolical, which proceed from the devil; Divine, by which God sometimes illuminates and instructs a person for his own salvation or that of others. They are distinct from visions and apparitions, in which persons see, but may not understand; when they understand, they are said to have a revelation.—C.E.; Koch-Preuss; Poulain, tr. Smith, The Graces of Interior Prayer, Lond., 1910. (M. J. W.)

Reverend, a form of address given to the clergy. Thus a priest is called Rev. Father; a Bishop, Right Rev.; an Archbishop, Most Rev. (A. M. C.)

Revisted Version

James (the Authorized) Version of the Bible, which had been made in 1611. The intervening two centuries and a half had seen a considerable advance in scholarly study of the original text; moreover, numerous expressions in the Authorized Version had become archaic. In 1885 the Revised Version was published. It is written in a more readable English style and is a more accurate translation than the Authorized Version. Cooperating with the English Revision Committee was an American Committee. The changes proposed by the latter were incorporated in an American Revised Version, published in 1901. This is called the American Standard Version.

Revolution, The French. The Revolution was not at the beginning a movement against the Church or clergy of France. The rank and file of the clergy were in favor of increasing the franchise of the Third Estate as representative of the people. No sooner, however, had the Constituent Assembly established itself than the old Gallican convention for the ascendency of the State above the Church asserted itself. As the need of money to carry on the Revolution became acute, it seemed advisable to the Assembly to stop the allowance for the salaries of the clergy and the upkeep of the clergy and to seize on Church property and convert much of it to the support of the new régime. Gradually the spirit created by Montesquieu, Voltaire, Rousseau, and Diderot possessed the leaders in the Assembly, and soon they determined to reconstitute the clergy on a new basis by what was called the Civil Constitution of the Clergy. This created new dioceses and authorized the voters, whether believers or not, to nominate parish priests and bishops, forswearing the latter to seek confirmation in office from Rome. The Assembly required all priests to swear to this Constitution. This Pius VI forbade and a slight majority obeyed him. Soon those who would not swear became liable to transportation to Guiana and even to death. Under the Convention (1792-93) which proclaimed the Republic, the Revolution became anti-religious. Catholics were persecuted; many priests were slain; at one time 1500 were stabbed or clubbed to death in foul prisons. An altar was raised to the Goddess of Reason in Notre Dame, the goddess a woman of low character. Robespierre attempted to establish a cult in honor of the Supreme Being. Out of fear of incensing the people in the provinces, the leaders hesitated to abolish religion or close the churches entirely. This explains the vacillating policy of the revolutionists. They succeeded, however, in driving out of the country nearly 10,000 priests. All this ceased with the advent of Napoleon in 1799, and the Concordat, unsatisfactory though it was, secured for the Church in France well-nigh a century of peace.—C.E.; Carlyle, The French Revolution, N. Y., 1890; Lord Chief Justice the Bishop, ed. Schuyler, Reflections on the Revolution in France, Lond., 1890; Gibbs, Men and Women of the French Revolution, Lond., 1905 (Ed.).

Rex glorieose Martyrum, or O Glorious King of Martyr hosts, hymn for Lauds for the Commemoration of many martyrs in Paschal Time; Ambrosian school, 6th century. It has 15 translations. The English title given is by R. Littledale and G. Palmer.—Britt.

Rex sempiterne Caclitum, or O Thou, the Heavens' Eternal King, hymn for Matins from Low Sunday until the Feast of the Ascension; Ambrosian school, 6th century. It has 10 translations. The English title given is composite.—Britt.

Rhedinum, rez'di-num, town on the E. coast of Sicily, at the entrance of the Straits of Messina, where St. Paul spent a day on his journey to Rome (Acts, 28); the modern Reggio.

Rhode Island, the 48th state of the United States in size, the 38th in population, and the 13th state to be admitted to the Union (19 May, 1790); area, 1,248 sq. m.; pop. (1920), 604,397. Although the Rhode Island charter of 1663 supposedly guaranteed freedom of conscience, a book of laws published in 1719 expressly excepted Catholics from holding office. Fair-mindedness towards the religion of the French allies brought tolerance in the wake of the Revolution, and in 1783 the obnoxious provisions of the law were repealed. During the encampment of Rochambeau's army at Providence and Newport, 1780, French chalpains offered Mass for the troops. Negro uprisings in Guadeloupe sent French refugees to Newport and Bristol towards the end of the 18th century, and these settlements were visited by Rev. John Thayer, 1791 and 1798, and later by Rev. Francis Malignon and the future Bp. Cheverus. By 1828 there were about 1000 Catholics in the state. Bp. Benedict Fenwick of Boston appointed Rev. Robert Woodley their pastor, and services were held in 1828 at Newport, in a former schoolhouse on Barney St. purchased for the purpose. In 1830 a church was erected on Mt. Vernon St. by Rev. John Corry. The first church in Providence was built on the site of the present cathedral in 1837, also by Fr. Corry. The Diocese of Providence (q.v.) comprises the state. The U. S. Religious Census of 1916 gave the following statistics for church membership in Rhode Island:

Rhodes, Knights of. See Hospitalers of St. John of Jerusalem.

Rhymed Bibles. Rhyme is found in the Hebrew text of the poetic books of the O.T. only sporadically and accidentally; but portions of the Scriptures have been done into rhyme in English, French, and Italian. Among the English rhymed versions, mostly of the Psalms, are those of Thomas Brampton (1414), Sir Philip Sydney (1580), and Lord Bacon (1600).—C.E.

Ribera, rã-bärâ, Josep or Juseppe de, called Lo Spagnoletto, “the little Spaniard” (1588-1656), painter, b. Jativa, near Valencia, Spain; d. Naples. He studied in Valencia with Francisco de Ribalta.
Going to Italy at twenty he was influenced by the works of Caravaggio towards the essential realism and the strong contrasts in light and shadow that characterize his style. He finally established himself in Naples, and was wealthy and distinguished by 1620. He could paint beauty, as is evident in his "Immaculate Conception" done for the Ursulines of Salamanca, and rivaling Murillo's masterpiece, or by "The Rapture of the Magdalene" in the Academy of San Fernando in Madrid, but he preferred to stir the emotions by scenes of suffering or horror. Typical works are "The Playing of St. Bartholomew," in the Prado in Madrid, "The Martyrdom of St. Lawrence," in the Dresden Gallery, the "Pietà" in the National Gallery, or still more realistic paintings such as "The Club Foot," "The Bearded Woman," and "Prometheus."—C.E.

Ricci, Matteo (1552-1610), Jesuit, founder of the Catholic Chinese missions, b. Macerata, Italy; d. Peking. In 1578 with Fr. de Ruggieri, he began missionary labors at Chao-k'ing, Canton; he first won the interest of the natives by exhibiting scientific instruments, then gradually introduced religious instruction. He labored very successfully in Shao-chow, and was called to Peking by the emperor, 1601. His treatise on the "True Doctrine of God," written in Chinese, became the manual of the missionaries. The policy he adopted in allowing the Chinese to retain various rites provoked a bitter controversy after his death.—C.E.

Rice, Edmund Ignatius (1762-1844), founder, b. Callan, Ireland; d. Waterford. He founded the Institute of Brothers of the Christian Schools, commonly known as the Irish Christian Brothers.—C.E.

Richard Bere, Blessed, martyr (1537), d. Newgate, England. He was the nephew of Richard Bere, abbot of Glastonbury, and was a monk in the London Charterhouse. With the other Charterhouse monks he was arrested, imprisoned at Newgate, and starved to death. Beheaded, 1588.

Richard Fetherston, Blessed, martyr, d. Smithfield, England. He was chaplain to Catherine of Aragon, and defended her cause against King Henry VIII. Refusing to take the Oath of Supremacy, he was hanged. Beheaded, 1588.—C.E.

Richard Kirkman, Blessed, martyr (1582), b. Addingham, Yorkshire, England; d. York. He was ordained at Douai, and sent on the English mission, 1578. Arrested near Wakefield, 1582, he was tried for treason, convicted, and hanged. Beheaded, 1588.

Richard of Bury (1280-1345), bibliophile, Benedictine, Bp. of Durham; b. Bury St. Edmund's, Suffolk, England; d. Auckland Durham. Son of Sir Richard Aungerville, he was educated at Oxford and became a Benedictine at Durham; high chancellor and treasurer of England in the reign of Edward III. He founded a library in Durham College, Oxford, bequeathing his books to it. He is chiefly remembered for his "Philobiblon," written to inculcate in the clergy the pursuit of learning and the love of books. C.E., XIII, 42.

Richard Reynolds, Blessed, martyr (1535), d. Tyburn, London. Educated at Christ's and Corpus Christi colleges, Cambridge, he entered the Brigitine Order, 1513. He was hanged with the Carthusian priors for refusing to take the Oath of Supremacy. Beheaded, 1888.

Richard Thirkeld, Blessed, martyr (1583), b. Coniseliffe, Durham, England; d. York. He graduated from Queen's College, Oxford, was ordained, at Reims, 1579, and began his mission near York. He was arrested, 1583, protested his priesthood, was tried, and hanged. Beheaded, 1888.—C.E.

Richard Whiting, Blessed, martyr (c. 1500-1559), last Abbot of Glastonbury, d. Tor Hill, Glastonbury, England. He was ordained, 1501, and elected abbot in 1525. He was hanged with John Thorne and Roger James for refusing to take the Oath of Supremacy. Beheaded, 1895.—C.E.

Richelieu, Richelieu, Armand Jean du Plessis, Duke of (1585-1642), cardinal and famous statesman; b. Paris; d. there. Destined for a military career, upon the resignation of his father, from the Bishopric of Lucon, he changed his plans, and after serious theological studies, obtained the see and was consecrated bishop when only twenty-two years old. He always discharged his episcopal duties with exemplary zeal, composed a remarkable catechism, wrote a refutation of Protestantism, and had missions preached all over his diocese. At the States General of 1614, where he was the mouthpiece of the clergy, he attracted attention by his eloquence and soon after was made Secretary of State by Maria de' Medici. After a brief disgrace he returned to power, was made cardinal, 1622, and President of the Council of Ministers, 1624; he occupied this post until his death, 18 years later. Richelieu's policies may be summed up as follows: at home, destruction of the Huguenot party, which, with British assistance, was creating a State within the State; curbing of the rebellious princes who were fomenting civil wars to serve their own ambition; abroad, the humiliation of the House of Austria, even by making alliances with Protestant princes and the Turks. The war against the Huguenots ended by the capture of La Rochelle, after a memorable siege conducted by Richelieu in person; in his fight against the princes he frustrated several plots and had some of the leaders put to death (Montmorency, Cinq-Mars, de Thou); in his struggle against the House of Austria he supported Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, and during the French period of the Thirty Years War (1635-43) had several armies fighting against the Austro-Spanish troops; although the war brought unspeakable miseries upon several French provinces, especially Artois and Lorraine, the cardinal persisted despite even the pleadings of St. Vincent de Paul. Richelieu was a great patron of letters and the founder of the French Academy (1634). He was one of the greatest statesmen France ever produced, but his actions were frequently inspired by a spirit of vindictiveness, and his policy of constant alliances with the Protestants of Holland and Germany for the sole purpose of humbling the House of Austria, cannot be condoned.—C.E.; Perkins, Richelieu and the Growth of French Power, N. Y., 1900. (P. P. D.)

The rich man's harvest was so abundant that he planned to tear down his old barns and build them larger. He calculated on having goods laid up for many years. "And I will say to my soul: . . . take thy rest; eat, drink, make good cheer. But God spoke to him: Thou fool, this night do they require thy soul of thee." The moral is: "A man's life doth not consist in the abundance of things which he possesseth."—Foncé, tr. Leahy, The Parables of the Gospel, N. Y., 1915.

Rings, Liturgical Use of. (1) Bishops, cardinals, and abbots wear a ring, “the seal of faith,” as a pledge to the Church. (2) Plain rings are worn by certain orders of nuns. (3) Conceiving the ring is part of the marriage ceremony, symbolizing union.-C.E.

R.I.P. = Requiescat in pace (May he [or she] rest in peace), abbreviation placed on tombstones at the end of obituary notices. Of late years, it has been much used by High Church Episcopalians, in America and Great Britain.

Ripon (George Frederick Samuel Robinson), Marquess of (1827-1909), b. London. He succeeded his father as Earl of Ripon, 1859, and the same year became Secretary of War. During the next half-century he was a member of every Liberal cabinet. Chairman of the commission which settled the Alabama Clauses, he was rewarded by being made Marquess of Ripon. In 1874 he became a Catholic. He was Governor-General and Viceroy of India, 1880-84.—C.E.

Rita of Cascia, Saint, widow (1586-1657), b. Rocca Porena, Italy; d. at the convent of Cascia. She was a model wife and mother for 18 years. After the death of her husband and sons, she became a nun at the Augustinian convent at Cascia, and was noted for her mortification, and was specially honored in Spain, where she is called the “Saint of the Impossible,” owing to the wonderful favors obtained through her intercession. Represented holding roses and lilies, sometimes with a wound in her forehead. Canonized, 1900. Feast, 22 May.—C.E.

Rite (Lat., ritus). (1) Any one religious function, e.g., the rite of Baptism. (2) A group of such functions, e.g., the last rites (Extreme Unction, Viaticum, etc.). (3) The whole collection of services used in the public worship of any church or group of churches, e.g., the Roman Rite. In this sense the term is often used as equivalent to Liturgy. The essentials of worship laid down by Christ form the foundation of every rite. The different prayers, actions, and customs used in the amplification of the fundamentals, distinguish the rites. Provided there be unity of faith, diversity of rites matters not at all. The four parent rites and those derived from them are:

I. Antiochene: (1) Pure Antiochene; (2) Rite of St. James (Greek, Syriac, and Maronite); (3) Chaldean: (a) Malabar; (b) Nestorian; (4) Byzantine; (5) Armenian.

II. Alexandrine: (1) Greek, St. Mark; (2) Coptic (St. Cyril, St. Gregory, St. Basil); (3) Ethiopic.

III. Roman: (1) Original Roman; (2) African; (3) African with Gallican addition; (4) Gallican: (1) Ambrosian; (2) Mozarabic; (3) Celtic.

In addition, some religious orders have their own rites, e.g., the Benedictine, Carmelite, Cistercian, Dominican, Franciscan (Friars Minor and Capuchins), Premonstratensian, Servite.—C. E.

Rites, Congregation of, created by Sixtus V, 22 Jan., 1688; its prefect is a cardinal. The officials peculiar to this Congregation are the Promoter of the Faith (popularly called the devil’s advocate), who raises objections against beatifications and canonizations, and the theologian, who prepares and corrects new offices. There are two groups of consultors: one for beatifications and canonizations, the other for sacred liturgy. This Congregation is charged with the direction of the liturgy of the Latin Church and therefore with supervising the performance of the rites prescribed for celebrating Mass and other ecclesiastical functions. It also grants all privileges relating to the rites and ceremonies of the Church. The inspection, correction, and condemnation of liturgical books, the approbation of new liturgical feasts and offices, and the solution of all doubts about liturgical matters pertain to it. To it also belongs the decision of causes of beatification and canonization of the faithful, and of the adoration of their relics.—C.E., XIII, 144.

Ritual (Ritusale Romanum), that book which contains the prayers and ceremonies to be used by the minister in the administration of the sacraments and sacramentals, especially those included in the Gelasianum. Alcuin’s Appendix to the Gelasianum, and the Ordines. The need for such a manual arose in the early Church; the first instance of such a collection is the “Liber Ordinum,” which dates from the latter half of the 7th century. In the 10th and 11th centuries these manuals became more general in the form of the Pontifical for bishops, and the Ritual for priests; the early Roman Manual did not strictly separate the episcopal from the priestly functions. Rituals for the secular clergy date only from the 14th century, and these, in a large degree, were compilations of the individual priests. Official diocesan rituals appeared only at the end of the 15th century. They are called "Man- ualia," "Liber Benedictinorum," "Agenda," "Ritual," "Pastoral," "Sacerdotal." The publication of the first official Roman Ritual Manual was ordered by Pope Paul V in the year 1614. This was revised by Pope Benedict XIV in 1742 and re-edited by Pope Leo XIII in 1884. The last official publication adapted to the New Code of Canon Law is by Pope Pius XI (1925).—C.E.

Ritualists, the name given to the Anglo-Catholics who sought to introduce more elaborate ceremonial into the services of the Anglican Church. At the time of the breach with Rome the Church of England retained practically the whole of the current Catholic ceremonial, but with the ascendency of Calvinism and Puritanism, much of this was discarded. One of the results of the revival of Catholic doctrine was the desire for the ancient ceremonial. This desire was not shared by all the Oxford leaders, but even so their care and reverence in the conduct of service won for them the name "Ritualist." They have made steady progress and today practically all Anglican Churches use a ceremonial far more ornate than the early "Ritualists" ever suggested.—C.E.; Benson, Non-Catholic Denominations, Lond., 1910.

Ritual Murder, a false accusation frequently made against the Jews, that at the time of the Passover they sometimes kidnap a Christian male child and, after torture, put him to death in derision of the Passion of Our Lord. The incident to which the foundation of this charge may be attributed was the murder of St. William of Norwich (1144), a crime for which Jews were tried and which was popularly attributed to them. The charge of ritual murder has been discredited by papal Bulls, including those of Popes Innocent IV, Gregory I, Martin V, and Paul III, and the Inquisition refused to give credence to such a charge when a case was referred to it by Benedict XIV. In a report to that body Pope Clement XIV declared that only two cases of so-called ritual murder had ever been proved, those of Andrew of Rinn (1442) and Simon of Trent (1475), and these had been motivated by hatred of Christianity, not by ritual requirements. Fr. Elphicke Veaundt states that "ritual murder has never been proved in a single instance of the cases that have been examined." An unfounded charge of this nature was made in New York State in 1929, and almost immediately withdrawn.

River Brethren, a religious sect which appeared in Pennsylvania, 1770. During a revival of the Lutheran, Mennonite, and Baptist churches, a dispute arose concerning the various forms of Baptism. The believers in triple immersion separated from the others, and although they had no definite organization, they designated various communities as "brethrenhoods," and looked to the community in the southern part of Lancaster County, called the "Brotherhood down by the River," as their authority. This probably accounts for the name. Dissensions arose, and there are now three bodies under the name of River Brethren: Brethren in Christ; Old Order, or Yorker Brethren; and United Zion's Children. In the United States in 1925 there were: 104 ministers; 88 churches; and 5019 communicants.

Rivington, Luke (1838-99), controversialist, b. London; d. there. After receiving Anglican orders he joined the Cowley Fathers, and became Superior of the United States in 1888. He entered the Catholic Church and was ordained, 1889. His writings deal chiefly with the weakness of the Anglican position. Among the more important are: "Authority; or a Plain Reason for Joining the Church of Rome"; "The Primitive Church and the See of Peter"; "Anglican Fallacies; or Lord Halifax on Reunion," etc. He re-edited Milner's "End of Religious Controversy."—C.E.

Roads, Roman. See Via.

Robber Council of Ephesus, held at Ephesus, 449, was not a council but a synod called to vindicate the heresiarch Eutyches from the condemnation of St. Flavian, Patriarch of Constantinople. Disagreeable scenes of violence occurred during one of the first sessions; Eutyches was vindicated, and St. Flavian, and Theodore, Bishop of Cyprus, were condemned without hearings. Both appealed to Rome. Pope St. Leo excommunicated all who had taken part in the assembly and declared all its acts null.

Robbia, Luca Della (1400-82), sculptor, b. Florence; d. there. He is famous as the inventor of a brilliant glaze for terra-cotta ware. Beginning with white figures on a blue ground he gradually introduced green and bits of gold, his followers increasing the use of color, especially in decorative borders of flowers and fruits. Influenced by Donatello and Ghiberti, his first work was done in marble and includes the well-known singing and dancing boys of the choir-loft of the Duomo in Florence. The bronze doors of the Old Sacristy are also his. In the work which bears his name are beautifully sculptured plaques and reliefs, including the "Madonna and Child" lunette of the Via dell'Agnolo, now in the Museo Nazionale, the "Madonna of the Apple" in the Berlin Museum, and the "Crucifixion" of San Miniato.

Andrea (1431-1528), nephew of the preceding, and his pupil, b. Florence; d. there. He is best known as the sculptor of the "Bambini," or swathed infants, which decorate the exterior of the Foundling Hospital in Florence, and "The Meeting of St. Francis and St. Dominick" in the loggia of the hospital of San Paolo in the same city. Five sons, Including Giovanni, Girolamo, and Luca the Younger, worked with him. C.E.; Cottewell, Luca, and Andrea Della Robbia, Lond., 1902.

Robert Bellarmine, Blessed, confessor (1542-1621), cardinal, b. Montepulciano, Italy; d. Rome. The son of Vincenzo Bellarmine, a nobleman, and Cinthia Cervini, sister of Card. Cervini, later Pope Marcellus II, he entered the Society of Jesus, 1560. He studied philosophy three years at the Roman College, taught humanities four years at Florence and Mondovi and finished his theological course at Louvain, where he taught (1570-76) and became celebrated for his Latin sermons. In 1576 he occupied the chair of controversial theology in the Roman College, in 1592 was elected rector, in 1594 was appointed Provincial of Naples and in 1598 created cardinal. He defended the Apostolic See against the anti-clericals in Venice and against the political tenets of James I of England; he wrote an exhaustive apologetic answering the prevailing heresies of the day and, concerning the relation of Church and State, took a position based on principles now considered fundamentally democratic, that authority originates with God, but is vested in the people, who entrust it to fit rulers. He was the spiritual father of St. Aloysius Gonzaga, helped St. Francis de Sales to obtain formal approbation of the Visitation Order, and opposed severe action in Galileo's case. Some of his best known ascetical works are "Ascent of the Mind to God" (1615), and "On the Seven Words of Christ" (1618), Beatified, 10 May, 1923. Feast, 17 Sept. Relics: St. Ignatius, Rome.—C.E., II, 411; Brodbrick, The Life and Work of Blessed Robert Francis Cardinal Bellarmine, S.J., Lond., 1928.

Robert Lawrence, Blessed, martyr (1537), d. Tyburn. A Carthusian priest, prior of Beauvale in Nottingham, he was executed with John Houghton and the other Carthusian friars. Beatified, 1888.

Robert of Geneva (Clement VII), antipope (1378-94); b. Geneva, Switzerland, 1342; d. Avignon. Bishop of Thérouanne, Abp. of Cambrai, and papal legate in Upper Italy; noted for his avarice and cruelty. The Western Schism was opened when he was elected to the papacy at Fondei by the French cardinals, who falsely claimed that they had elected Urban VI under intimidation, Robert was unable to secure Rome and took up his abode at Avignon. He made no sincere effort to end the schism and even donated a large part of the Papal States to Duke Louis of Anjou. His claims were supported by a number of the Latin countries, some of the minor German States, Scotland, Denmark, and Norway. C.E.; Butler.

Robert Salt, Blessed, martyr (1537), d. Newgate prison, London. He was a Carthusian lay brother, imprisoned for refusing the Oath of Supremacy, and starved to death along with Thomas Johnson and the other Carthusians. Beatified, 1888.

Roch, Saint, confessor (1205-1327), b. Montpellier, France; d. there. He is said to have been miraculously marked at birth with a red cross on his breast. Left an orphan at twenty, he distributed his fortune among the poor. Visiting Italy as a mendicant pilgrim, he devoted himself to the care of the plague-stricken, effecting miraculous cures by making the sign of the cross. He himself was stricken with the plague, and lying in a deserted forest, was discovered by a dog; for this reason he is generally portrayed with a dog. Returning to Montpellier he was arrested as a spy and cast into prison, where he died. He is reputed to have been stricken with the plague and laid in a deserted forest, was discovered by a dog; for this reason he is generally portrayed with a dog. Returning to Montpellier he was arrested as a spy and cast into prison, where he died. He is reputed to have been stricken with the plague and lying in a deserted forest, was discovered by a dog; for this reason he is generally portrayed with a dog. Returning to Montpellier he was arrested as a spy and cast into prison, where he died.
Vendôme, France; d. at Thoré. Sent by the French king to the aid of Washington, he rendered important services in the American Revolution. During the French Revolution he commanded the army of the north, but when the Jacobins became supreme, he was forced to leave France. Napoleon granted him a pension; he spent his last years preparing his memoirs.—C.E.

Rochester, ancient diocese. England, founded, 604, by St. Augustine, with St. Justus as bishop. The cathedral, begun by Gundulf, contains the shrine of St. Paulinus, and the relics of St. Ethelmar, the first Saxon bishop. The last Catholic bishop was Maurice Griffith (1554-58).

Rochester, Diocese of, New York, embraces Monroe, Livingston, Wayne, Ontario, Seneca, Cayuga, Yates, Steuben, Chemung, Tioga, Schuyler, and Tompkins Counties; area, 7081 sq. m.; suffragan of New York. Bishops: Bernard J. McQuaid (1868-1909); Thomas F. Hickey (1909-28); John Francis O'Herr (1929). Churches, 159; priests, secular, 240; priests, regular, 19; religious women, 889; college, 1; seminaries, 2; academies, 3; high schools, 5; parochial schools, 28,757; institutions, 8; Catholics, 208,634.

Rochester, city, New York, originally part of the Diocese of Buffalo, and in the early days of its history under the spiritual jurisdiction of the Jesuits, who had flourishing missions throughout the section. Made a diocese, 24 January, 1868, the first Bishop, Rev. Bernard J. McQuaid, was consecrated, 12 July, the same year. Zealous for Catholic education, he established St. Andrew's Preparatory Seminary and St. Bernard's Seminary; his clergy built several parochial schools. The Religious of the Sacred Heart carried on educational work in the city as early as 1855; Nazareth Academy for girls was established by the Sisters of St. Joseph shortly afterwards; and a Catholic High School for boys and girls was opened in 1906 in the old Cathedral Hall by Bp. Hickey (consecrated, 24 May, 1905). Catholics have exerted an appreciable influence on the city's charitable work, as proven by the number of flourishing Catholic charitable organizations and institutions. In 1845 the R.C.A. Society, was incorporated for the support of orphan asylums, including St. Joseph's Orphan Asylum, exclusively for German Catholics. St. Anne's Home for the aged of both sexes, and St. Mary's Hospital, one of the largest and most fully equipped hospitals in the city, are noteworthy. Bp. McQuaid succeeded in securing state support for chaplains in state industrial schools and reformatories and the county maintains a chapel in Rochester for such institutions. The city at present (1929) has 37 churches, 31 parochial schools, and 101,756 Catholics.

Rochet, an over-tunic, usually of white linen or cotton, reaching to the knees, with tight-fitting sleeves, which, like the hem, are embroidered or trimmed; a non-official vestment worn by prelates. —C.E.

Rock, Daniel (1709-1871), priest and ecclesiologist, b. Liverpool; d. London; author of "Hierurgia, or the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass," and "The Church of Our Fathers"; the latter, treating of the Sarum Rite and medieval observances, profoundly influenced liturgical study in England.—C.E.

Rockford, Diocese of, Illinois, established 1908; embraces Jo Daviess, Stephenson, Winnebago, Boone, McHenry, Carroll, Ogle, DeKalb, Kane, Whiteside, Lee, and Kendall counties; area, 6807 sq. m.; suffragan of Chicago. Bishops: Peter J. Muldoon (1908-27); Edward F. Hoban (1928). Churches, 103; stations and chapels, 21; priests, secular, 138; priests, regular, 17; religious women, 268; academy, 1; high schools, 40; pupils in parochial schools, 8061; institutions, 11; Catholics, 60,603.

Rockhampton, Diocese of, Australia, comprises the territory in the State of Queensland between Hinchinbrook and Port Curtis on the East Coast, and westward between straight lines from these points to the Northern Territory; suffragan of Brisbane. Bishops: John Cani (1892-98); Joseph Higgins (1899-1905); James Duhig (1905-32); Joseph Shiel (1913). Churches, 33; priests, secular, 47; priests, regular, 3; religious women, 313; boarding schools, 17; secondary schools, 8; primary schools, 43; pupils in Catholic schools, 6755; institutions, 4; Catholics, 42,147.

Rococo Style (Fr., rocaille, shellwork), name given in the 19th century, by French émigrés, to the style which developed in France about 1715-50. It is called Style Régence or Louis XV. It is the climax and degeneration of the Baroque period. In architecture, it is a form of arbitrary ornamentation; the heavy horizontal lines of Baroque are broken by shell-like curves. The sculpture is effeminate, best suited to light materials. In painting, this period is represented by the work of Watteau and Boucher, who depicted the artificiality of court life with much beauty of coloring. The frivolity of this style makes it unsuitable for ecclesiastical art.—C.E.

Rod in Scripture. (1) "Thy rod and thy staff, they have comforted me" (Ps. 23). (2) Rod of Aaron. "When Pharaoh shall say to you: Shew signs; Thou shalt say to Aaron: Take thy rod and cast it down before Pharao, and it shall be turned into a serpent" (Ex. 7). "Carry back the rod of Aaron into the tabernacle of the testimony" (Num. 17). "And Aaron took the rod before Pharao, and his servants, and it was turned into a serpent... but Aaron's rod devoured their rod" (Ex. 7). "And there were twelve rods besides the rod of Aaron" (Num., 17). “He . . . found that the rod of Aaron, for the house of Levi, was budded” (Num., 17). “Take the rod . . . thou and Aaron thy brother, and speak to the rock before them and it shall yield waters” (Num., 20). “And the Ark of the Testament . . . in which was . . . the rod of Aaron that had blossomed” (Heb., 9). (3) Rod of Jesse. “And there shall come forth a rod out of the root of Jesse: and a flower shall rise up out of his root” (Is., 11).

Rotation Days (Lat., rogare, to ask), 25 April, and the three days before the Ascension, observed to appease God’s wrath, ask protection, and invoke a blessing on the harvest. They were known in England as “Gang Days” and “Cross Week.” The Litany of the Saints is chanted in the procession, and the Rotation Mass follows. The older procession of 25 April, called therefore Major Litany, Christianized a pagan procession in honor of the God Robigus. The institution of the others, adopted in Rome under Leo III (795-816) as Minor Litanies, is ascribed to St. Mamertus, Abp. of Venice (c. 475), who ordered processions with special prayers because of calamities which were afflicting the country.—C.E.; West, tr. Mullaney, Matters Liturgical, N. Y., 1926. (n. r.)

Roger James, Blessed, martyr (1539), d. Glastonbury, England. He was sub-treasurer of the Abbey of Glastonbury, and was arrested with his abbot, Bl. Richard Whiting, and Bl. John Thorne, tried at Wells, and executed for refusing to acknowledge the king’s ecclesiastical supremacy. Beatified, 1893.

Rohrbacher, rōr-bär’kər, RENE FRANÇOIS (1789-1860), church historian, b. Langatte, France; d. Paris. He was ordained, 1812, and after doing parish work for a while at Lunéville, he joined the Congregation of St. Peter founded by the brothers De Lamennais, and for eight years directed the theological and philosophical studies of the postulants. After De Lamennais’s condemnation, he became Professor of Church History at the Nancy Seminary and then retired to Paris. His chief work is his monumental “Histoire Universelle de l’Eglise Catholique” in 29 volumes, continued by Chantrel and Guillaune. Though somewhat uncritical and devoid of literary merit, it dealt a heavy blow to Gallicanism, and is still very valuable.—C.E.

Roll (Lat., rotula), a long narrow strip of papyrus or parchment, written on one side, wound like a window-shade about its staff; the earliest “volume” of which we know. In the 4th and 5th centuries these rolls were partly replaced by bound books, but certain purposes rolls were retained. To this class belong legal records, manuscripts for the chanting of the “Exultet,” and mortuary rolls or documents employed to publish the names of the deceased of monasteries and other associations.

—C.E.

Roman Catholic, a term commonly applied today to the Church established by Christ. It has a correct and an erroneous sense. The ordinary name of the Church is Catholic. After the Reformation, various terms of reprobation were applied to the Church, particularly in England, such as “The Romish Church,” “The Romish Catholic Church,” “Papist Church,” or “Popish Church.” With the dying down of the more violent phase of the persecution of the Church, a term was invented to designate the Church, without recognizing its claims to be the One True Church, perhaps without intending an odious sense, but still often used to imply that it is foreign and not in accord with the national spirit, or tradition. This term, “Roman Catholic,” is generally adopted today as a non-controversial term.

Roman Catholic Relief Bill (England). See Emancipation.

Roman College, a stiff white linen neck-band, fastened in the back, and worn by priests outside of the church or rectory. From it usually hangs a silk breast-piece known in the United States as “rabbah.”

Roman Colleges, various institutions in Rome for the education of seminarians, most of them national. There students reside, and sometimes follow special courses; they follow the regular courses in philosophy and theology in a few large central institutions such as the Propaganda, Urban College, Gregorian University, Roman Seminary, and the Minerva (Pontifical and International College of the Angelic Doctor). The Roman Colleges are thus grouped in several clusters, each including a center for purposes of instruction and a number of affiliated institutions, having a rector, vice-rector, and spiritual director. Included among the Roman Colleges are: Capranica College (Alma Collepo). Major Pontifical Roman Seminary, Pius Seminary, Vatican Seminary, Seminary of Sts. Peter and Paul, Lombard Seminary of Sts. Ambrose and Charles, German Hungarian College, German College of S. Maria dell' Anima, German College of Campo Santo, Greek Pontifical College, Ruthenian Pontifical College, English College, Bede College, Scots College, Irish College, Urban College, Maronite College, Belgian College, American College, South American College, Polish College, St. Jerome College for Yugoslavia, French Seminary, Bohemian College, Armenian College, Spanish College, Canadian College, Portuguese Pontifical College, and Leonine Pontifical Seminary.—C.E.

Roman Congregations, Decrees of. Many of the decrees and resolutions of the Roman Congregations have been published in various collections. Some of the collections are sanctioned by papal authority, the Congregations have vouched for the genuineness of others, while some have received no official recognition. Through the official bulletin of the Holy See, "Acta Apostolicae Sedis," the important acts are published bimonthly. Catholic periodicals in various countries also publish them with more or less completeness; e.g., "The American Ecclesiastical Review"; "The Homiletic and Pastoral Review"; "The Irish Ecclesiastical Record."

(Roman Court (Curia Romana), the ensemble of departments or ministries which assist the Sovereign Pontiff in the government of the Church. It comprises the eleven Roman Congregations, the Roman Tribunals, which number three, and the five offices of Curia.—C.E., XIII, 147.

Romanesque Art and Architecture, the style which prevailed in Europe from the time of Constantine until the 11th century. It was called Norman in England, and Lombard in Italy. It was characterized by the cruciform church with aisles and transepts, the apsidal chapel, barrel vaulting, and round arches and pillars. In wood-carving, low relief was the prevailing method, and the doors of the Cathedral of Spoleto in high relief are the greatest achievement of Romanesque carving. Art of this period shows preference for colored effects by gilding and painting. In metal work cloisonné enamel was used, plastic ornamentations in silver became more common, and secular types of decoration were used on ecclesiastical articles. Sculpture in stone consisted of reliefs subordinated to architecture. Later the portals were decorated with figures. The most perfect examples are in cathedrals of central France.

Roman Processional, a book consisting of a single section of the Roman Rituall (Titulus IX) with supplementary materials taken from the Missal and the Pontifical. It prints in full the text of the hymns, litanies, and other prayers together with the music and some of the responses. (c. 1100.)

Roman Question, the problem of reconciling the inalienable right of the Holy See to temporal sovereignty with the natural desire of the Italians for a united nation with Rome as the Capital, since the necessary conditions of this sovereignty would be immunity from subjection to any civil ruler, and civil jurisdiction over a state or sovereign territory. The Question arose when the Italian troops occupied Rome, 20 Sept., 1870. In protest against the usurpation of papal territory, the popes remained voluntary prisoners in the Vatican for 59 years, during the greater part of which sectarian prejudice and hatred kept Italy from coming to terms. On 11 Feb., 1929, the Question was settled by the Treaty of the Lateran, in which Italy recognized both the sovereignty of the Holy See as a national entity, and the City of the Vatican as territory independent of Italy, abolished the Law of Guarantees, and settled all financial relations by payment of 750,000,000 lire cash, and 1,000,000,000 in Italian state consols at five per cent; the Holy See in turn renounced its rightful legal claim to the City of Rome, and the old Papal States.

from both the Gallican and Spanish rites. The Roman Rite is the one used most extensively today. It is the inclusive rite of the Latin Church, and the Patriarchate and with the exception of Milan, Toledo, and the Byzantine Churches of Southern Italy, Sicily, and Corsica, is used throughout all of Western Europe, and in all countries colonized from there. Priests of other rites, however, observe their respective liturgies even within these limits, just as priests of the Roman Rite observe their even though situated in the East. The language of the Roman Rite is Latin except for a few churches along the eastern coast of the Adriatic, where Slavonic is used, and on rare occasions, Greek at Rome.—C.E.; Fortescue, The Mass, A Study of the Roman Liturgy, N. Y., 1914. (M. E. B.)

Romans, Epistle to the. Paul wrote this Epistle at Corinth, c. A.D. 58, before leaving for Jerusalem with the collections he had made for the relief of Christians there. He wished to prepare the way for a visit to the members of the Church in Rome, whom he longed to meet, because they were for the most part Gentiles and he was the Apostle of the Gentiles. Besides, he appreciated the mission of Rome as the center for the propagation of the faith everywhere. In the Epistle he dwells on the justification of mankind through faith in Christ, the sinfulness of the world, the meaning and fruits of justification, why Israel failed to come unto the law of justice, what faith is, and why it is essential, and its fruits, viz., humility, obedience, unity, and charity. Chapters 12-16 are the most fervent and impressive. It is read in the Divine Office immediately after the Epiphany.—C.E.; Prat, tr. Stoddard, The Theology of St. Paul, N. Y., 1926. (Ed.)

Roman See (Lat., sedes romana, Roman seat), the seat of government of the Universal Church; the Roman Church in a local sense. Also the office of the supreme head of the Church; in the latter sense more commonly called the Holy See, the Apostolic See, See of Peter, Papacy. The Roman See was founded by St. Peter c. 42 A.D. and governed by him till his death, c. 67 A.D. This fact constitutes the historical foundation of the claim of the Bishops of Rome to the Primacy of Peter. In attempting to destroy this claim the Lutherans and Calvinists, and more recently some Rationalists have tried to prove that St. Peter never was at Rome. No scholar of any repute denies it now. The Roman See has always been the primatial see of Christendom. Even during the first three centuries it was acknowledged as such by all the churches of the world. Before the end of the 1st century the church at Corinth appealed to the Roman Church to heal a schism. In the early part of the 2nd century Ignatius of Antioch addressed the Roman Church as the President of the Christian society and gratefully received its instructions and commands. To the Roman Church came the leaders of all the early heresies, seeking approval from the Bishop of Rome, and rebelling only when it was refused. The Bishops of the Roman See were the only ones who dared to summon Councils, and to excommunicate, i.e., to cut off individuals and whole provinces from the common unity in Christ. Its bishops always acted as the judges of Christian life and discipline. To the Roman Church we owe the closing of the canon of the Latin Church, and the beginnings of Canon Law. It was the one appealed to in all times of stress and misfortune. In a word, for the first three centuries, the churches of the world looked to the Roman See for authoritative decisions in all matters of faith, discipline, government, and ritual for they saw in its bishops the successors of St. Peter, the Vicar of Christ on earth. The supremacy of the Roman See has been attacked since then, however, in the Greek Schism, Protestantism, etc.

The succession of bishops in the Roman See is a guarantee that Apostolic doctrine has been preserved in its original purity. Communion with this See was, according to St. Ambrose, St. Augustine and others, a test of orthodoxy. The death of St. Peter in the Roman See has for all time irrevocably fixed it as the chief see of the Christian Church. Circumstances, in times past, have made it necessary for its bishops to reside elsewhere (at Avignon during the great Western Schism), but they still remained bishops of Rome and consequently the successors of St. Peter. From St. Peter, the first bishop, to the present Pope, Pius XI, 291 bishops have ruled the See of Rome. In modern times the actual diocese is governed by a Cardinal Vicar. Within the territorial limits of the Roman See are situated the various offices of Congregations and Commissions employed in administering the affairs of the Universal Church. Every bishop has jurisdiction over the province of his residence, as in the case of the Bishop of Rome. The Pope, as the Bishop of Rome, has the power of appointing and confirming, in their sees, the Spanish bishops of Elbas (Roussillon) and Gerona.—C.E.; Mann.

Romanus (Lat., Roman), Pope (c. 897), b. Galilee, Italy. Little is known of his life except the fact that he was a cardinal and that after his election he granted the pallium to Vitalis of Grado; and confirmed, in their sees, the Spanish bishops of Elbas (Roussillon) and Gerona.—C.E.; Mann.

Romanus, Saint, martyr (c. 258), d. Rome, Ostiary of the Church at Rome. According to his legend he was a soldier, converted to Christianity by the example of St. Lawrence, by whom he was baptized. Relics in S. Lorenzo and Santa Caterina dei Funari, Rome. Feast, R. Cal., 8 Aug. Several martyrs of this name are mentioned in large companies of Christians.—C.E.; Butler.

Rome, city and diocese of the Pope, known also as the “See of Peter,” the “Apostolic See,” the “Holy Roman Church,” the “Holy See,” and the “Eternal City.” It was inhabited as early as the 8th century B.C., and, according to some authorities, several centuries earlier. Its first growth is obscure, there being, however, three clearly-defined original tribes, Ramnians (Latin), Tittians (Sabines), and Luceclus (Etruscans). The members of these ancient tribes were known as patricians, and their struggle down to the Imperial period with the newer inhabitants or plebeians resulted in the civil, political, and judicial organization of Rome. With the end of the reign of Tarquinius Superbus, the last of its hereditary kings, Rome took to itself the republican form of government, with two consuls, elected for one year, and a dictator elected in difficult times to wield unlimited power. The dictatorship and the oligarchy led naturally to the monarchy, of which Julius Cesar was the first acknowledged exponent. Under the emperors, although the Roman power materially extended, Roman history is no longer that of the city of Rome, notwithstanding the fact that it was not until Caracalla's reign (A.D. 211) that Roman citizenship was accorded to all free subjects of the Empire.

According to ancient tradition St. Peter first came to Rome in A.D. 42, although St. Barnabas is also given as its first evangelist, and at the arrival of St. Paul (c. 60) the Christians had become numerous. The systematic and continued persecutions began under Nero (c. 64) but the Church continued to grow so that even after the fury of the Decian persecution, c. 250, the city numbered about 50,000 Christians. Heresies, too, appeared here, even at this early period; Arianism alone, however, disturbed the religious peace of the era. With the Vandal invasion of 456, although the destruction of Rome did not then begin, there ensued a long period of incessant attacks upon the waning power of the Empire, principally by the Goths and Lombards, the ancient Senate and the Roman nobility finally becoming extinct with the Byzantine occupation of 552. After the coronation of Charlemagne, 800, though the pope was master at Rome, the power of the sword was wielded by the imperial missi. Thus the government was divided. Later, in the 11th century, the temporal power of the pope threatened by the decline of the Carolingian dynasty, became a cause of war in the friction between papacy and empire. With the absence of the popes from the city in the 14th century a tenure of anarchy set in which, during a comparatively brief period, disrupted the fragile pretense of civilization. After the Schism of the West, the real reburst of Rome began with Martin V, the patronage of letters and of arts, however, soon degenerating into a license and luxury which was followed by the sack of 1527. With the ending of the pontificate of Pius VI came the proclamation of the Republic of Rome, 1798, and the pope's exile. Pius VII was able to return, but after 1806 there was a French government at Rome, as well as the papal, and in 1809 the city was incorporated into the empire. After the coronation of Pius IX the Constituent Assembly, Feb., 1849, declared the papal power abolished, and hatred against the Church culminated in the massacre of defenseless priests and the wrenching of churches, until the restoration of the papal power by the French, Aug., 1849. Garibaldi invaded the Papal States, 1867, although it was not until 1870 that Rome was taken from the popes and made the capital of the Kingdom of Italy. By a treaty between the Italian Government and the Vatican, 11 Feb., 1929, the full and independent sovereignty of the Holy See in the City of the Vatican was recognized.

The non-religious buildings of Rome include the Palace of the Cancellaria and the Curia of Innocent X, now occupied by the Italian Government. The principal ancient edifices include the Flavian Amphitheater or Coliseum, the Arch of Constantine, the Circus Maximus, Trajan's Column, and the Mausoleum of Augustus. The most notable museums are the Vatican, Lateran, Capitoline, Borghese, and the National Galleries. The diocese comprises 66 parishes, 56 in the city and 10 in the suburbs, with 362 churches and chapels and 550 secular priests; also the four great basilicas: St. John Lateran, St. Peter's, St. Paul's Outside the Walls, and St. Mary Major; the patriarchal basilica of St. Lawrence Outside the Walls, and the ten minor basilicas: S. Croce in Gerusalemme; St. Sebastian Outside the Walls; S. Maria in Trastevere; S. Lorenzo in Damaso; S. Maria in Cosmedin; Santi Apostoli; S. Pietro in Vincoli; S. Maria Regina Celi in Monte Santo; S. Maria degli Angeli; Sacred Heart, at the Castro Pretorio. Other interesting churches are the Gesù, a 16th-century church; S. Maria Sopra Minerva, the only authentic Gothic church in Rome; S. Cecilia, a very ancient church, standing on the site of the saint's home; S. Salvatore della Scala Santa, containing the stairs of Pilate's pretorium. The institutes of public charity are all consolidated in the Congregazione di Carità. For ecclesiastical instruction there are, besides the various Italian and foreign colleges, 3 great ecclesiastical universities: the Gregorian, under the Jesuits; the schools of the Roman Seminary; and the Collegio Angelico of the Dominicans. The University of Rome, established 1303, is now under control of the Italian Government.—C.E.; Chandleury, Pilgrim Walks in Rome, St. L., 1927.

Rome, University of, founded by Pope Boniface VIII, 1303; declined after the transference of the Papal Court to Avignon, and was closed, 1370. It was reestablished by Eugene IV, 1431, who increased the revenues and drew up new regulations for its government. Numerous chairs were added by succeeding pontiffs; and the schools, especially that of law, flourished, although the student attendance was never large, often being smaller than the number of professors. It was closed during the pontificate of Clement VII but reopened by Paul III, who obtained such distinguished professors as Lainez, S.J., for theology; Faber, S.J., for Scripture; Copericus for astronomy, and Accoramboni for medicine. At this time it acquired the name "Sapienza." It again began to decline in the 16th and 17th centuries, was reorganized in the 18th, but at the end of the 19th came under control of the Italian Government and is now called the Royal University. It has the usual number of faculties and numerous associate schools. Students, 4453.—C.E., XIII.

Romesco, or Romfod, old English name for Peter's Pence.

Romuald, Saint, abbot (c. 950-1027), founder of the Camaldolese Hermitage, b. Ravenna, Italy; d. Val-di-Castro. Horrified at his father's sin of murdering a relative, Romuald retired to the Benedictine monastery of S. Apollinare, near Ravenna, where he became abbot, 996-999. For almost thirty years he traveled about Italy, reforming monasteries and establishing hermitages. The last fourteen years of his life he spent in seclusion at Mt. Sitría, Bifolco, and Val di Castro. Relics at Fabriano. Feast, R. Cal., 7 Feb.—C.E.; Butler.

Ronan, Saint, confessor (8th century), Bp. of Lismore, Ireland. He was the distinguished successor... of St. Carthage, and several churches in Munster are named for him. Feast, 9 Feb.—C.E.

Ronan of Iona, Saint, confessor (c. 660). He was a monk at Iona, who engaged in controversy with St. Finan, Bp. of Lindisfarne, concerning the celebration of Easter. Feast, 18 Aug.—C.E.

Rood (A.-S., rod, cross). (1) The true cross on which Christ died. (2) In medieval architecture, a large crucifix, often with the statues of Our Lady and St. John on either side, placed over the entrance to the choir or chancel of a church on a gallery, screen, or beam spanning the chancel arch. It was usually of richly carved wood painted and gilded, and by the 13th century was a usual feature of the churches of western Christendom. Rood lights, rood screen, rood loft, rood stairs, and rood spire designate, respectively; the oil lamps or tapers kept burning before the rood; the screen, often beautifully wrought of stone, wood, or iron, between chancel and nave, upon which the rood was placed; the loft or gallery surmounting the screen, from which the priest sometimes read the Epistles and Gospels or preached to those assembled in the nave; the stairs, often spiral and finely sculptured leading from either side of the rood screen to the rood loft; the exterior spire over the intersection of the nave and transept, marking the position of the rood.—C.E.

Rood-screen, an enriched screen usually surmounted by a rood, in the rood-loft, placed between the chancel and the nave, i.e., between the clergy and the people, of medieval churches. Its precise origin is obscure, though it is possibly traceable to a merely ornamental feature of two 4th-century basilicas; doubtless its later use was practical rather than symbolic. Some are constructed of stone and later examples are of metal work, but usually they are of wood, having close paneling often with painted figures of saints, below, and open screenwork above, supporting tracery and richly carved cornices and crestings. In some churches the rood-screen extended across the aisles. Notable remaining examples are at Causton, England; Troyes, France; Louvain, Belgium; and Lübeck, Germany.

Roof of a church, a symbol of the charity that covers a multitude of sins.

Root of David, title of Christ in Apocalypse, 5 and 22, where the word "offspring" is added to make its meaning clearer. It is borrowed from Isaias, 11, where it designates the future Messias, "As the Prophet foresaw, the stump of the old tree of the House of David sent forth a new David to rule the nations."—The Apocalypse of St. John, ed. Swete, N. Y. (W. S. B.)

Rorate Coeli (Drop down dew, ye heavens!), first words of Isaias, 45, a text used frequently in Mass and the Divine Office during Advent, as Introit, versicle, antiphon, and responsory.—C.E.

Rosary, Confraternity of the Holy, an organization formed under the auspices of the Dominican Order. The members promise to recite the 15 decades of the Rosary once each week. The names of the members must be on the register of the organization, and they are granted a participation in all the good works performed by the members of the Dominican Order throughout the world.—C.E., XIII, 188.

Rosary College, River Forest, Ill., founded, 1922; conducted by the Dominican Sisters; college of arts and sciences; summer school; professors, 40; students, 551; degrees conferred in 1929, 50.

Rosary of the Blessed Virgin Mary, a form of prayer (vocal or mental), consisting of 15 decades of Hail Marys, said on beads, each decade preceded by an Our Father and followed by a Gloria, during the recitation of which the mind meditates or dwells on the principal mysteries of the life, death, and resurrection of Our Lord. This is the true Rosary, sometimes called the Dominican, or Rosary of St. Dominic, because its origin has been traditionally attributed to that saint. As a rule five decades are recited at a time. Other rosaries are more properly called beads, as the beads of the Immaculate Conception, the beads of the Seven Dolors, the Blessed Sacrament beads. The Rosary is the most popular of the non-liturgical prayers. It has been richly indulgenced by many popes. The beads should be blessed by a Dominican or any other duly authorized priest. Pope Leo XIII instituted the Month of the Holy Rosary (October) and added the invocation "Queen of the Most Holy Rosary" to the Litany of Loreto, 1883.—C.E., (J. F. S.)

Rose, an emblem of beauty and love. These flowers, in Christian art, encircle the Heart of Mary, the "Mystical Rose," and a wreath of them is worn by certain female saints, e.g., Elizabeth of Hungary, Rose of Lima, Teresa of Jesus. (J. C. T.)

Roseau, Diocese of, Trinidad, B.W.I., including the following islands of the Caribbean Sea: Dominica, Montserrat, Antigua, St. Kitts, St. Croix, St.
Hebrew year, and, next to Yom Kippur, or Day of Atonement, the greatest feast of the Hebrews. It is the first day of Tishri (Oct.), the seventh month of the Hebrew calendar.

Rose Window, a circular window with mullions and tracery, generally radiating from the center, filled with stained glass. It is so named from its fancied resemblance to a rose. It is a beautiful characteristic of Gothic architecture in which it was developed. At first it was placed under a round, then under a pointed arch, where soon it was inscribed in a square with spandrels. Finally in a tier of lower windows it became the center of a vast composition. Roses filled with glass of great beauty were used by the Lombard builders of Italy.

Rōsh ḥašḥānah, or Feast of Trumpets, the first day of Tishri (Oct.), the seventh month of the Hebrew year, and, next to Yom Kippur, or Day of Atonement, the greatest feast of the Hebrews. It is ordained in the words "The seventh month, on the first day of the month, you shall keep a sabbath, a memorial, with the sound of trumpets" (Lev., 23).

It is celebrated as New Year's Day, and is also called Day of Judgment; in preparation for it, the trumpet (shophār) is sounded morning and evening excepting Sabbaths, during the entire preceding month.—C.E., XV, 70.

Rosicrucians (Lat., fraterinitas rose crucis, brotherhood of the Red Cross). (1) A sect which arose at the beginning of the 17th century, but which traced its origin to Christian Rosenkreuz, 200 years earlier, who is said to have learned Arabian magic while traveling in the East. It was devoted to occultism and mysticism. (2) A branch of Freemasonry, to which only Master Masons are admitted and whose members claim to be directly descended from the brotherhood of 1408.—C.E.

Rosminians. See Institute of Charity.

Rosmini-Serbati, Antonio (1757-1855), philosopher and founder of the Institute of Charity, b. Rovereto, Austrian Tyrol; d. Strass, Italy. He studied first at home, then at the University of Padua, being ordained, 1821; became Doctor of Canon Law and Theology, 1822; and later made extensive studies in philosophy. His works provoked much opposition. He taught that the human mind is endowed with an innate cognition and the single conception of ideal being, a mental form, a condition of knowledge and the light of reason. His ontology and natural theology and his "Trattato della Coscienza" were severely criticized and 40 of his propositions were condemned by the Congregation of the Inquisition in 1887. He has written a valuable work on education, "Dell' Educazione Cristiana." The Institute of Charity (q.v.) owes its foundation to him.—C.E.

Ross, ancient diocese in Scotland, founded, c. 1128, by David I; comprised territory on the northeastern coast of Scotland, bounded N. by the bishopric of Caithness, s. by Argyll, and w. by Moray and Moray Firth. The first bishop was Macbeth (c. 1128), and the last pre-Reformation bishop, John Leslie (1665-96). The cathedral at Dornoch, dating from the 14th century, is of Gothic architecture; it is in ruins save for the south aisle and a portion of the chapter-house.

Ross, Diocese of, comprises a portion of Co. Cork, Ireland; suffragan of Cashel. The see was established by St. Finian, d. 550, who also founded the famous School of Ross, devastated towards the close of the 12th century. Episcopal succession remained unbroken until after the Reformation. Bl. Thady MacCarthy, appointed, 1482, was forcibly removed from his benefice, 1488. Thomas O'Herlihy (1562-80) was present at the Council of Trent. In 1625 it was necessary to administer the diocese through a vicar-general. Puritans razed part of the cathedral in 1647; in 1693 the diocese was placed under the administration of the Bp. of Cork; it was united with Cloyne, 1748-1849. The diocesan seat was removed to Skibbereen under Bp. O'Hea (1857-77), who was succeeded by William Fitzgerald (1877-97), Denis Kelly (1897-1925), James Roche (1926). Ross, School of, founded by St. Facltina, and famous for its study of Sacred Scripture and its liberal education. St. Brendan the Navigator was a teacher there. In 1127 Toldrheadbauch O'Connor laid waste the land and the Anglo-Normans under Fitz-Stephen compiled the devastation. After this date, all record of the school is lost.—C.E.

Rossini, Gioacchino Antonio (1792-1868), composer, b. Pesaro, Italy; d. Paris, near Paris. He owed his education to his singing masters and to the Chevalier Giusti; through the twenty operas he produced in a period of eight years he obtained the success which later numbered the Italian Opera at Paris, Berne, and Paris; he returned to Mme. de Warem's home, "Les Charmettes," where he stayed about six years. He went again to Lyons as private tutor, then to Paris, where he met Diderot and the Encyclopedists. Having spent a year in Venice as secretary to the French ambassador, he came back to Paris, wrote music, and began the Italian Opera at Paris, Berne, and Paris; he composed all of them to a foundling asylum. Later he retired to a cottage in the forest of Montmorency, as the guest of Mme. d'Epinay. Obliged to hide after the publication of "Emile," he sought refuge in Switzerland, in England, and in Paris, everywhere obsessed by the delusion of persecution. Finally M. de Girardin offered him shelter at his Chateau of Ermenonville, where he died. His chief works are: "The Discourse on the Arts and Sciences," in which he assails reason and science; the "Discourse on the origin of inequality among men," in which he develops his favorite theory that man is by nature good and virtuous but is depraved by society; the "Social Contract," which became the gospel of the Revolution; "Emile," in which he develops his theories on education, and which contains, alongside of some excellent ideas, many utopian views and very grave errors; the "New Heloise," a novel in which he preaches a return to the natural state; and the famous "Confessions," in which imagination plays such a part that they are unreliable as an autobiography. The influence of Rousseau has been enormous in philosophy, in politics, in religion, and in literature. He paved the way for the Romantic School and the lyricism of the 19th century, prepared the revival of religious sentiment, and created a new literary style by which he is the forerunner of Chateaubriand and Lamartine. He was also the creator of a new false philosophy which he calls "Instinctivism," and proclaimed the sacredness of sensual passion; he, the apostle of natural religion, was the enemy of all positive religions and is responsible for some of the most dangerous social and political errors of the present time.—Maritain, Three Reformers, N. Y., 1929. (F. P. D.)

Royal Declaration, the solemn repudiation of Catholicity which, from 1689 to 1718, was required from every sovereign of Great Britain. It was sometimes called "the King's Protestant Declaration," "the Declaration against Transubstantiation," or, incorrectly, "the Coronation Oath." This last was never objected to by Catholics, being a simple promise to govern justly and maintain "the Protestant Reformed Religion established by Law." The Royal Declaration, however, commencing "I, . . . King of England, Scotland and Ireland, . . . do solemnly and sincerely in the presence of God, profess, testify, and declare, that I do believe that in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper there is not Round Towers. Over 100 of these, built from about the 8th to the 13th centuries, exist in Ireland, most of them now in ruins. The lower part is constructed of solid masonry, with a high doorway accessible only by ladder, and with walls tapering inward to the top. Of varied size, their height is from 60 to 132 ft., that at Kilcullen being the highest. Having Christian embellishments and always built near a church, they were doubtless constructed by Christians for purposes of refuge. On the side of Scotland remote from Ireland, strangely enough, there are three round towers of the Irish type, viz., Eglishey in Orkney, Abernethy, and Brechin; there is one in the Isle of Man, and several Norman examples in Norfolk, Suffolk, and Essex. Lower and wider round towers existed in various European localities in pre-Christian times, e.g., the Nuraghi of Sardinia.

any Transubstantiation of the elements of bread and wine into the Body and Blood of Christ at or after the consecration thereof by any person whatsoever; and that the invocation or adoration of the Virgin Mary or any other Saint, and the Sacrifice of the Mass, as they are now used in the Church of Rome, are superstitious and idolatrous,” and going on to declare that this statement was made “without any evasion, equivocation, or mental reservation whatsoever,” was offensive, inasmuch as the Mass was stigmatized as idolatrous, the phraseology “adoration” of the Virgin Mary and the Saints “as now used in the Church of Rome” was a false statement of Catholic doctrine, and the general tone of the oath was one of studied insult to the Catholic office-holders after the supposed “Popish Plot” of 1678, in which Catholics were excluded formally from public office, and eventually came to be used exclusively for sovereigns. Several unsuccessful attempts to alter it were made after 1891; at the coronation of 1902, it was noticed that Edward VII recited the words of the oath almost in a whisper, and with evident signs of embarrassment. In 1910, through the influence of George V, the formula was changed before the coronation to a simple declaration of loyalty to the Protestant faith, and a promise to uphold the Protestant succession to the throne.—C.E.

Rudolph Acquaviva, BLESSED, martyr (1550-83), missionary, b. Atri, Italy; d. Cuncolim, India. A nephew of Claudius Acquaviva, he entered the Society of Jesus, 1568, and arrived at Goa, India, 1578. He spent three years at the court of the Great Mogul. While preparing the site of a new church, he was slain with several companions. Beatified, 1893.

Rufford Abbey, Cistercian monastery, Nottinghamshire, England, founded c. 1147 by Gilbert de Gant and colonized with monks from Rievaulx Abbey. Its estates have been in the possession of the Savile family since 1018.—C.E.

Rule, Religious, a plan of life after the spirit of the Gospel, imposed on members of religious orders to help them work in common for the special objects of their institute. The first rules were plans of perfect life, with details differing according to persons, times, and places, but based on the Gospel, and found in the Acts of the Apostles. As orders began to approach their modern form, and new ones were founded having their own special objects, each institute had its own rule. In the beginning the rule was simply a short code of asceticism, with such modifications as were necessary for the organization of common life; and in the orders properly so called, there were added to this code the regulations required by the special objects of each institute. The four great rules are those of St. Basil, governing most monks of the Greek Rite; St. Benedict, the principal rule of the Western monks; St. Augustine, common to the Carmelites, the Minims, the Society of Jesus, the Passionists, and the Redemptorists all having their own constitutions only.—C.E., XII, 760.

Rule of Faith, the standard or norm which enables believers to determine what they must believe. The remote rule of faith is the revealed Word of God, as contained in Holy Scripture and Divine Tradition; the proximate rule of faith is the teaching of the Church drawn from both these sources. The Vatican Council has declared that:
“all those things are to be believed with divine and Catholic faith which are contained in the Word of God, written or handed down, and which was given the Church either by a solemn judgment or by her ordinary and universal teaching, proposes for belief as having been divinely revealed” (Sess. III, c. 3). Protestants maintain that the Bible or Written Word of God alone, privately interpreted, constitutes the proximate rule of faith. —C.E., V, 769. For a Complete Rule of Faith, Wash., 1924. RULES OF THE WORLD OF THIS DARKNESS, one of the several terms St. Paul (Eph., 6) applies to the evil spirits, whose leader is the “prince of darkness” (q.v.). As a consequence of original sin the world had been given over to the “world-rulers of this darkness,” but by the redeeming death of Christ it was bought back to the kingdom of God and of light. (n. s.)

Rumania, kingdom in the Balkan Peninsula; area, 122,282 sq. m.; pop., 17,393,149. Christianity was introduced into Rumania by the Romans, who used the Latin form and liturgy. An episcopal see existed in Tomi, nine bishops of which (4th and 6th centuries) are on record. During the Bulgar domination in the 9th century, the ancient Catholic Church of Rumania disappeared and the people placed themselves under the jurisdiction of the Greek Patriarch of Constantinople and were thus drawn into the Greek Schism. The greatest enemy in these early times was the Turk, but by their zealous defense of their religion the ancestors of the present Romanians upheld the culture and civilization of the Christian West from the onslaught of Islam. The earliest evidences of the modern Catholic Church in Rumania appeared in the 13th and 14th centuries, as a result of Hungarian and Polish immigrations. Several Catholic dioceses were erected in the Middle Ages. In 1246 a bishopric was founded at Severin on the Danube, and a third Catholic diocese was established at Sereth, 1370. The Diocese of Arges dates from 1246, the fifth see was created at Baja, and the Diocese of Bacau was founded in 1607. Since the bishops of these dioceses did not reside within their territory, the spiritual care of the people was undertaken by Franciscans and Dominicans, who erected many monasteries. Stephen the Great (1457-1504) organized the Church, erected a new bishopric, and founded several churches and monasteries. His son, Bogdan III, allowed the maintenance of the Christian faith, the free election of its princes, and independent domestic administration. At the time of the Reformation, the majority of the Catholic faith in Rumania and the building of a church in Bucharest, 1633. The See of Sofia established at the beginning of the 17th century was occupied chiefly by Franciscan Observants, who gradually replaced the Conventuals as missionaries. During the 17th and 18th centuries there grew up a flourishing ecclesiastical literature and spiritual lyrical poetry. The foundations of Rumanian culture were laid, and the Rumanian language began to replace the Old Slavonic. From 1712 to 1821, the gloomiest period for the Romans, a large portion of their land was given to Greek monasteries in the East and much of its income left the country. The Passionists had arrived in Bucharest, 1781, and the Christian Brothers and religious orders of women came between 1862 and 1865. The Archdiocese of Bucharest was erected, 1883. In 1886 the independence of the Orthodox Church in Rumania from the Patriarchate of Constantinople was effected. Immigrations from Austria and Hungary in the 19th century increased the number of Catholics, and a reorganization of the Catholic Church in Rumania was necessary. A concordat with the Holy See was concluded, July, 1929. According to the constitution the Greek Orthodox is the State Church, but all religious bodies enjoy absolute freedom of worship. State support is given only to the Orthodoxy Church. In 1929 Rumania included the following ecclesiastical divisions:

Rupert, Saint, confessor (d. 718), Bp. of Salzburg, apostle of Bavaria and Carinthia, d. Salzburg. He undertook his apostolic labors, which extended from the territory of the Danube to the borders of Lower Pannonia, at the invitation of Theodo, Duke of Bavaria, 696. He received from the duke the territory of Juvavum (Salzburg), where he founded the Benedictine monastery of St. Peter, of which he became the first abbot, and a convent of Benedictine nuns. According to tradition, he promoted the exploitation of the salt mines at Salzburg. Represented in art holding a vessel of salt. Feast, 24 Sept.; at Salzburg, 23 March.—C.E.; Butler.

Rural Dean (L.L., decanus, one set over ten), a priest, ordinarily a pastor, selected by the bishop to supervise a section of the diocese (deanery, vicariate forane, archpresbyterate), to convsle his clergy periodically for theological conferences, and to report annually to the bishop concerning the condition of his district; also called vicar forane, archpriest.—Augustine, Rights and Duties of Ordinaries, St. L., 1924. (n. s.)

Russell, Charles William (1812-80), writer, b. Killough, Co. Down, Ireland; d. Dublin. Professor of ecclesiastical history at Maynooth, he became president, 1857; was appointed a member of the Irish Historical Manuscript Commission, 1869, and acted as joint editor of the “Report on the Carte Manuscripts in the Bodleian Library.” A contributor to the “Dublin Review,” he also wrote articles for “Chambers’s Encyclopedia” and the "Encyclopedia Britannica," and translated Leibnitz's "System of Theology." He exercised great influence on prominent men of his age, among them Newman and Wiseman.—C.E.

—CHARLES, BARTON RUSSELL OF KILLOVEN (1832-1900), jurist, nephew of preceding, b. Newry, Ireland; d. London. He practised law in Ireland with great success, and was called to the English Bar, 1858. In 1872 he became a Queen's Counsel; his great ability made him the foremost lawyer of his times. His greatest effort was his speech in defense of Parnell, before the Parnell Commission. In 1893 he represented Great Britain in the Behring Sea arbitration. In 1894 he was made lord of the admiralty, and raised to the peerage for life; he was also appointed lord chief justice. He represented England on the Venezuelan Boundary Commission in 1899. His Catholic faith alone prevented him from being appointed lord chancellor in the Liberal government of 1892, such an appointment being contrary to the provisions of the Act of Settlement.—C.E.

Russia, Socialist Federal Soviet Republic, in Europe; area, 8,241,910 sq. m.; pop., 147,013,609. From the time of Peter the Great to Alexander I, relations with the Holy See, but the popes were hostile to the Russian Orthodox Church. Until 1437 Russian metropolitans had no connection with the Holy See; but the popes were then invited to come to Russia, and Catherine established the Diocese of Moscow, 1772, brought great numbers of Catholics to Russia, and Catherine established the Diocese of White Russia, 1774, a national church independent of Rome, after which she began the systematic destruction of religious orders; but Catholic principles were propagated by the Jesuits whom Catherine invited to White Russia, 1779. The second and third partitions of Poland, 1793-94, considerably increased the number of Catholics in Russia, and Catherine was false to her promise of tolerance. From 1797 there was constant strife and persecution until Gregory XVI in 1842 called the attention of the Catholic world to the oppression of the Catholics in Russia. By a concordat, 1847, an archbishopric and six episcopal sees were established, several inquisitorial laws were repealed, and the authority of the Holy See was recognized to a greater degree; but in 1850 convents were suppressed, and Catholics were forbidden to restore or build churches. Alexander II allowed the sees to be filled, 1856, but soon the clergy were accused of plotting against the tsar, and the soldiery profaned churches and took priests prisoners, exiling several to Siberia. Under Alexander III negotiations between the Holy See and Russia were renewed, and Russia had a legation at the Vatican, but the clergy continued to endure oppression until Nicholas II published the edict of religious toleration, 1905. Within two years great numbers were converted to Catholicity, and great social and educational activity was developed by the clergy. The reactionary party of the Church desired the reestablishment of the United Church in Russia. However, Catholicity continued among the cultured classes, due to the efforts of the great philosopher, Vladimir Soloveff.

The Soviet Government disestablished the Church and declared the free profession of all religions. The Orthodox Church is the prevailing religion of the country. In 1922 the Soviet Government decreed the confiscation of all Church property, appropriating ecclesiastical wealth to feed starving peasants. Catholics are in a majority in the former Polish provinces, their affairs are entrusted to a Collegium; Mohammedans are scattered through eastern and southern Russia, while the Jews are found mainly in the western and southwestern districts. All churches are leased from the state free. Teaching of religion in state and private schools is prohibited, but special religious classes may be organized for persons over 18. Before the Revolution the Orthodox had 66 bishoprics, 3 metropolitans, 14 archbishops, and 50 bishops, and the management of the Church was in the hands of 62 consistoria. In 1929 Russia comprised the following Catholic ecclesiastical divisions:

Ruth (Heb., rahath, friend), a Moabite woman whose story is recorded in the Book of Ruth, B. Book or, one of the proto-canonical writings of the O.T., containing a beautifully written story of a family of Bethlehem in the time of the Judges. Elimelech, under the pressure of famine, left Bethlehem with his wife Noemi and his two sons, to settle in the land of Moab. The sons there married Moabite women, but died without children. After the death of her husband and her sons, Noemi returned to Bethlehem accompanied by Ruth, one of her daughters-in-law, whose filial devotion is expressed in most touching terms (Ruth, 1, 16). At Bethlehem Ruth married Booz, a relative of Elimelech. The marriage was not strictly a levirate marriage, such as is legislated about in Deuteronomy, 25. Booz and Ruth were ancestors of David (Matt., 1), of whom a genealogy is given at the end of the book. The purpose of the book was doubtless to preserve an edifying story relating to the origins of the great king, David, not to recommend levirate marriage nor to combat the rigor of Esdras and Nehemias in regard to marriage with foreigners. The example of filial piety and its reward is particularly striking. As regards the date of composition, the first verse makes it evident that it was written after the times of the Judges; and the genealogy comes down to the time of David. Fr. Paul Jonon, S.J., in the latest Catholic commentary (Rome, 1924), judges, chiefly from the language of the book, that it dates from after the Exile.—C.E.; Schumacher.

Ruthenian Rite, the liturgy used by the Ruthenian Uniates in Poland, Hungary, and the United States. It is practically the same as the Byzantine Rite of the Orthodox Church; it is said in the old Slavonic language, the ancient tongue of the Ruthenians.—C.E.

Ruthenian Rite, the liturgy used by the Ruthenian Uniates in Poland, Hungary, and the United States. It is practically the same as the Byzantine Rite of the Orthodox Church; it is said in the old Slavonic language, the ancient tongue of the Ruthenians.—C.E.

Ruthenians, a Slavic people, comprising about 22,000,000, in western Russia, Poland, Hungary, and the United States. Their name dates from the time of Charlemagne, and they claim to be the original Russians. The majority of them are now Uniates who, having become estranged from Rome during the Eastern Schism, were reunited in 1595 (see BREATH, UNION OF) under Pope Clement VIII. They use the Ruthenian Rite. They number about 400,000 in the United States.—C.E.

Ruthwell Cross, an ancient Runic cross of stone, dating from the 7th or 8th century, now in the church at Dumfriesshire, Scotland. A portion of Cynowulf's poem, "Dream of the Rood," in which the tree of the Cross is conceived of as telling its own story, is engraved upon it, and is said to be the earliest piece of written English extant.

Ryan, Abram J. (1839-86), poet-priest of the South, b. Norfolk, Va.; d. Louisville, Ky. During the Civil War he served as chaplain in the Confederate army. The South was completely won by his "Conquered Banner," the best known of his poems. Distinguished as preacher and lecturer, he is chiefly remembered as the author of "Poems, Patriotic, Religious, and Miscellaneous."—C.E.

Ryder, Henry Ignatius Dudley (1837-1907), English Oratorian priest and controversialist, d. Edgbaston, England. The son of an Anglican clergyman, he was received into the Catholic Church, 1846, and was a lifelong friend of Newman, whom he succeeded as superior of the Birmingham Oratory. The three pamphlets which he wrote in protest against the extravagant views of Wilfrid Ward on papal infallibility are remarkable for their style and theological knowledge. His works include "Catholic Controversy," "A Review of Dr. Ward's Scheme of Dogmatic Authority," and "Poems Original and Translated."—C.E.
Sabbatarians, members of a sect who, though not Jews, hold to the keeping of the Jewish Sabbath, rather than the Christian Lord's Day. Some of them, while observing Sunday, have sought to make it as rigorous as the Sabbath of the Old Law; others, more consistently, keep the seventh day of the week instead of the first, as a day of rest. The former have been found in various Protestant bodies, the latter are generally members of such sects as the Adventists, Seventh-Day Baptists, etc. After the settlement of the Judaizing controversies of the 1st century, Sabbatarianism arose again in the 16th century, and has continued until the present time. —C.E.

Sabbath (Heb., shabbath, rest from labor), the Jewish weekly day of rest, Saturday. On this day the Jews were obliged to attend services in the synagogue, and refrain from all kinds of work, because God had finished the work of creation and rested on this day. —C.E. (C. J. D.)

Sabbatical Year (Heb., shabbaton, year of rest), the seventh year devoted to a cessation of agriculture, and holding in the period of seven years a place analogous to that of the Sabbath in the week. The three prescriptions enjoined were: (1) all agricultural labor was to be suspended; (2) no debts could be exacted from an Israelite; (3) the law was to be read on the Feast of Tabernacles to all Israel. The object of the year was to impress on the people that the land was the Lord's and they only the tenants. —C.E. (C. J. D.)

Sabelianism. These Sabellians (so called after Sabellius, a theologian of the early 3rd century) were heretics belonging to the school known as the Monarchians because they held only one Divine principle in the Trinity. The Sabellians first taught that the Father became Man in Christ and gave His life for the redemption of the world. They favored an essential and numerical identity between the Father and the Son. Later they appear to have modified their doctrines. According to Epiphanius they maintained that just as three realities go to constitute man—body, soul, and spirit, so in God three realities constitute One Person; but these realities are so explained as to mean three modes of acting or manifestations. Sabellianism was the popular name for this heresy in the East; in the West it was more familiarly known as Patripassianism (Lat., pater, father; passus [pati], having suffered). Repeatedly condemned, it did not die out until the 5th century. (R. J. G.)

Sabina (Lat., Sabine), saint, martyr (126), d. Rome. She was a wealthy widow of Umbria in Italy, converted to Christianity by her servant Serapia, who was martyred for her faith. Sabina at first escaped because of her position, but was so zealous in the practise of her religion that she too was put to death; her relics were brought to the Aventine in 430, and there a basilica bears her name. Feast, R. Cal., 28 Aug.—C.E.; Butler.

Sabinianus, Pope (604-606), b. Blera (Bieda), Italy. Sent by St. Gregory I as nuncio to Constantinople, 593, he later succeeded him as pope. His pontificate was disturbed by a threatened invasion of the Lombards, and by a famine. —C.E.; Mann.

Sackcloth, garment of rough texture, like haircloth, worn next to the skin to do penance, or as a sign of contriteness and humiliation.

Sacra jam splendent decorata Iychnis, or A THOUSAND LIGHTS THEIR GLORY SHED, hymn for Matins on the feast of the Holy Family, third Sunday after the Epiphany. It was written by Pope Leo XIII (1810-1903), and has two translations; the English title given above is by Mgr. Henry. —C.E.; Britt.

Sacrament (Lat., sacra res, a sacred thing). Among profane writers, the word sacrament designates a sacred thing, as a soldier's oath. Theologically a sacrament is a sensible sign, instituted by Christ, to signify and produce grace. The essentials of a sacrament are: an external rite, significative and productive of grace, and Divine institution.

Pre-Christian Sacraments. Circumcision both in the law of nature and the Mosaic Law is generally regarded by theologians as a sacrament, instituted by God to remit original sin; in an infant this was effected by the faith of the parents in the promised Redeemer; in an adult by the faith of the recipient. Other sacraments in the Mosaic Law are: Paschal Lamb, ordination of priests, and legal purifications. These rites did not produce grace of themselves, they roused faith and other dispositions which contributed to win from God the infusion of grace.

Sacraments of the New Law, Trent (sess. VII, can. 1) defines that Christ instituted seven sacraments: Baptism, Confirmation, Holy Eucharist, Penance, Extreme Unction, Holy Orders, and Matrimony. The Greek Church and Eastern sects accept this septenary number of the sacraments. Protestants generally teach that there are two sacraments of the Gospel, Baptism and the Lord's Supper; for the others "have no visible sign of ceremony ordained by God." Christ the God-Man immediately instituted the sacraments. As God, He is the principal cause of them, since God alone can give to a material rite the power to produce grace; Christ as Man instituted them and also gives them their efficacy from His merits and death. Efficacy of the Sacraments. Protestants teach that sacraments are only symbolic, they do not give grace; their purpose is to rouse faith, so that fiduciary faith, not the sacrament, is the medium of grace and heavenly gifts. Trent (sess. VII, can. 8) teaches that the sacraments produce grace ex opere operato, from Divine institution they are instrumental causes of grace. Hence the sacramental rite, independent of the faith, merits, or worthiness of the minister, confers grace when the recipient places no obstacle. If a sacrament is received without the necessary dispositions, it gives no grace; however, theologians teach that when the evil disposition is removed, then the sacrament revives and gives grace; this doctrine is certain for Baptism, and is probable for the other sacraments except Holy Eucharist and Penance, which do not revive. Matter and Form. The sacrament is composed of two elements: matter, the determinable element, and form, words which determine the matter; both together signify and produce grace. For a valid sacrament then, the minister must use valid matter and pronounce the essential words of the form; moreover as a rational creature, the minister, he must determine the purpose of the rite and so have at least the intention of doing what the Church does. If the sacrament is made and administered for the purpose of mockery or mimicry, the sacrament is invalid due to defective intention. Division of the Sacraments. The noblest of the sacraments is Holy Eucharist, for it contains Christ Himself. Some sacraments are more necessary for salvation than others, thus Baptism is necessary for all; Penance for those who fall into grave post-Baptismal sin; Holy Orders to give sacred ministers to the Church. Effects. They produce sanctifying grace or increase it and they give sacramental grace, i.e., the right to actual graces granted by God at opportune times in order that the obligations imposed by the sacrament may be faithfully fulfilled. Baptism, Confirmation, and Holy Orders imprint a character on the soul, hence they can be received but once. Minister. The laity, i.e., the contracting parties, are the ministers of Matrimony; a lay person can be the extraordinary minister of Baptism in the case of danger from death; outside the above, the minister must be ordained. Heretical and schismatical ministers validly ordained, can administer valid sacraments, for the efficacy of the sacraments is solely from Divine institution and the merits of Christ, and so it does not depend on the faith or worthiness of the minister. Recipient. To receive the other sacraments valid Baptism is necessary. Adults must have at least an habitual intention to receive a sacrament but in Penance and Matrimony this virtual intention is required. No intention is required for infants and the perpetually insane to receive the sacraments of which they are capable. To receive the sacraments worthily, the recipient must have the requisite dispositions, i.e., supernatual attribution for the sacraments of the dead; a state of grace for the sacraments of the living.—C.E.; Pohle-Preuss, The Sacraments, I-IV, St. L., 1920-24. (F. M.)

Sacramentals, any object set apart and blessed by the Church to excite good thoughts, to increase devotion, and thus to remit venial sin. The name signifies that the article blessed has some resemblance to a sacrament, inasmuch as it is a means of grace; but a sacramental differs from a sacrament in this, that the latter always produces grace directly when there is no obstacle on the part of the recipient, while the former produces it only indirectly, by causing devotion in the mind of the user. The sacramentals include: sign of the cross, crucifix, holy oil, vestments, stations of the cross, holy oils, candles, rosary, scapulars, agnus Dei, palms, incense, church bells, religious medals, and ashes.—C.E.; Sullivan, Externals of the Catholic Church, N. Y., 1918. (J. F. R.)

Sacramentary in the Latin liturgy, is that book which is used by the celebrating bishop or priest alone, for vocal prayers during the Mass (the Prayer, Secret, and Postcommunion, and movable parts such as the Preface, Communion, etc., and the Canon) also the prayers used at special functions in connection with the Mass (e.g., Baptism on Holy Saturday, processions), also the prayers used by a bishop at ordinations, consecrations of churches and altars, prayers of exorcisms, and blessings which are now to be found in the Pontifical and Ritual. The following are the most important Sacramentaries: Roman Sacramentaries, including the Leonine, named after Pope St. Leo I, the Gelasian Sacramentary ascribed to Pope Gelasius I, the Gregorian Sacramentary edited by Pope St. Gregory I; British Isle Sacramentary; Gallican Sacramentary; the Ambrosian Sacramentary; the Sacramentary of the Cathedral of Toledo, known from the testimonies of the Visigoth or Mozarabic Liturgy.—Schuster, tr. Levelis-Marke, The Sacramentary, N. Y., 1924. (D. R.)

Sacrament-house, a tabernacle usually situated on the north or Gospel side of a church outside the sanctuary. Here the Blessed Sacrament was kept in a monstrance behind locked metal doors of lattice work through which the Host could be dimly seen by the faithful. They were used extensively throughout central Europe, especially in the 14th and 15th centuries.

Sacramento, Diocese of, California; comprises Alpine, Amador, Butte, Colusa, Calaveras, Del Norte, El Dorado, Humboldt, Lassen, Mariposa, Modoc, Mono, Nevada, Placer, Plumas, Sacramento, Shasta, Siskiyou, Sutter, Tuolumne, Tehama, Trinity, Yolo, and Yuba counties in California, and Churchill, Douglas, Esmeralda, Humboldt, Lyon, Ormsby, Storey, Washoe, and Mineral counties in Nevada; area, 91,562 sq. m.; suffragan by the Religious of the Society of the Sacred Heart; founded, 1866; conducted by the Religious of the Society of the Sacred Heart; degrees conferred in 1929, 127; priests, secular, 87; priests, regular, 3; religious women, 229; parochial schools, 11; pupils in parochial schools, 2958; institutions, 10; Catholics, 59,850.

Sacraments, Congregation of the (de disciplina Sacramentorum), provides for and regulates concerning the reception and reservation of the Seven Sacraments, dispensations for candidates for Holy Orders, and dispensations for Matrimony. The doctrine of the Sacrament is the province of the Holy Office, and the ceremonial of the Congregation of Rites.—C.E., XIII, 140.

Sacraments, Symbols of. Collectively, the seven-branched candlestick of the Jewish Temple, Separately, for Baptism, a flowing fountain; for Confirmation, a descending dove, emblematic of the Holy Ghost; for the Holy Eucharist, a chalice and Sacred Host, or grapes and wheat; for Penance, the Keys of Peter; for Extreme Unction, a vessel inscribed O Itecum Infirmonum, the Oil of the Sick); for Holy Orders, a chalice and a stole denoting priestlyhood and authority; for Matrimony, clasped hands. (J. F. S.)

Sacraments of the Dead are Baptism and Penance. They are so named because from Divine institution, their primary purpose is to remit grave sin, either original or actual, and to confer sanctifying grace on those who are spiritually dead from sin. (R. B. M.)

Sacred College of Cardinals, a corporation known since 1150, as a collegium, formed of the cardinal-bishops, cardinal-priests, and cardinal-deacons, who felt that they had this right since they alone elected the pope, were his immediate assistants at Mass, and his only counselors in all important matters. The dean or head is the Bp. of Ostia, now Cardinal Vannutelli; the sub-dean, the Bp. of Porto, now Cardinal Vico. There are 63 cardinals at present: Italy has 30; France, 7; Spain, 5; United States and Germany, 4 each; Austria and Poland, 2 each; Belgium, England, Holland, Portugal, Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Canada, and Brazil, 1 each.

Sacred Heart, Academy and Convent of the (Kenwood), boarding-school for girls maintained by the Religious of the Society of the Sacred Heart of Jesus on the outskirts of Albany, N. Y. It was founded in 1853 by Mother Aloysia Hardevy, and offers the equivalent of grammar and high school courses and one year of college. The convent is the center of the Eastern Vicariate and the novitiate-house of the United States. Statistics (1929): professed religious, 60; novices, 40; postulants, 23; pupils, 125.

Sacred Heart, College of the, Cincinnati, O., conducted by the Religious of the Society of the Sacred Heart of Jesus; preparatory school; colleges of arts and sciences, education; special courses; professors, 14; students, 60; degrees conferred 1929, 15.

Sacred Heart, College of the, New York City, N. Y., founded 1917; conducted by the Religious of the Society of the Sacred Heart of Jesus; college of arts and sciences; professors, 35; students, 210; degrees conferred in 1929, 42.

Sacred Heart, College of the, Rimouski, Quebec, Canada; conducted by the Brothers of the Sacred Heart; professors, 10; students, 375; number of degrees conferred in 1929, 5.

Sacred Heart, Devotion to the, devotion which has as its dogmatic foundation the Incarnation of the Second Person of the Blessed Trinity. On account of the hypostatic union every part of our Lord's Human Nature is worthy of adoration. Hence, therefore, we adore His bodily Heart, beating in His Bosom. But besides this adoration, we honor the Heart of Jesus as a reminder, or symbol, of His love for us, and we are moved to make Him a return of love, because He has loved us and He is not loved by men. Love, consecration, and reparation are the characteristic acts of this devotion. In this form it is now solely approved by the Church. On the feast of the Sacred Heart celebrated on the Friday after the Octave of Corpus Christi an act of reparation is prescribed for recitation in every church in the United States. It is celebrated to St. Margaret Mary Alacoque in the Visitation Monastery at Paray-le-Monial that the feast of the Sacred Heart is now kept on the day assigned by Our Lord. In spite of much opposition the feast was allowed in 1765, and extended to the world in 1856; in 1929 it was raised to the highest rank. Special manifestations of the devotion are the Communion of Reparation on the first Friday of the month, and the Holy Hour in union with Our Lord in His Agony.—C.E., VII, 163. (x. c.)

Sacred Heart, Normal College and Academy of the, Grand Coteau, La., founded 1821; college founded, 1917; conducted by the Religious of the SACRED HEART College, West Bathurst, New Brunswick, founded 1899; conducted by the Eudist Fathers; professors, 22; students, 250; degrees conferred in 1920, 10.

Sacred Heart of Jesus, Feast of the, Friday after the Octave of Corpus Christi, symbolizing the love of Christ for all mankind. It was established by Pope Clement XIII in 1763, and extended to the universal Church by Pope Pius IX in 1856.

Sacred Host (Lat., hostia, victim), the bread after the Act of Consecration, when it has been changed into the Body of Christ, Victim of the Sacrifice.

Sacred Species (Lat., species, appearance), the bread and wine after the consecration by which they are changed into the Body and Blood of Christ, retaining only the appearances of what they were formerly.

Sacred Vessels are the chalice with its paten, the ciborium, the pyx, and the luna of the ostensorium. Each is described under its own title. A sacred vessel, if it contains the Blessed Sacrament, must not be touched by anyone except a priest or a deacon, unless in grave necessity. If the vessel be empty it may be handled by clerics not in Sacred Orders, or by those who have obtained permission, such as repairers of sacred vessels. All others who may handle an empty sacred vessel should use a cloth, to prevent direct contact. (J. F. S.)

Sacrifice (Lat., sacrificium, sacrifice) in a less rigorous or a figurative sense is any offering made to God with a view to honoring Him, such as acts of virtue, almsgiving, and prayer. Sacrifices in the true or rigorous sense is the offering to God of a sense-perceptible substance, which is either really or symbolically destroyed, or at least transformed and withdrawn from profane use; and this offering must be made by a duly authorized person in recognition of God's Infinite Majesty and man's absolute dependence on Him. This definition contains generic and specific elements. By its generic element, sacrifice is an external act of the virtue of religion (by which God is honored on account of His transcendent excellence) and belongs to the cult of latria. It is clear that the external act derives all its moral value from a corresponding act of the human will. By its specific elements, sacrifice is marked off from other acts of the virtue of religion.

Four constituent elements enter into its very notion and must be present in every sacrifice. (1) The SACRIFICIAL INTENTION. This is the intention of the sacrificing minister to offer to God a sacrifice in the true sense by means of a sacrificial act (forma sacrificii). It has for its primary object the acknowledgment of God's Supreme Majesty and man's entire dependence on God (finis intrinsicus) but does not, on that account, exclude such secondary intentions (finis extrinsecus) as the sacrificing minister may add of his own choice. (2) The SACRIFICING MINISTER. Under the law of nature there were private sacrifices (Abel; Abraham) for which no special authorization was needed on the part of the community. Under the same law, public sacrifices required a minister duly authorized by family or tribe. Revealed religions, Judaism and Christianity, have public sacrifices only, which are at the same time cult sacrifices. They require an authorized minister who is a priest in the proper sense of the term, or a minister (by which God is honored on account of His transcendent excellence) and belongs to the cult of latria, which is the primary object of the sacrifice minister. This external manifestation of his intention affects the gift itself, which is thereby altered or transformed or withdrawn from profane use and consecrated to God. There is a controversy among Catholic authors as to whether this change or alteration requires a physical destruction (either in the strict or an equivalent sense) or is sufficiently expressed by a moral consecration. There are no absolutely convincing arguments for either view. This much is certain: if God has instituted a sacrifice, it must possess all essential elements of a sacrifice. The formless essence (forma physica) of the sacrificial act lies in the oblation, sensibly manifested, whereby the ritual slaying or destruction or alteration is directed to God in acknowledgment of His supreme dominion. This oblation is necessary, for without it the destruction of a thing is not a sufficient expression of the sacrificial intention.

The proximate matter of the sacrifice (the destruction of the gift) and the oblation are often distinct in concept only (inasmuch as the actual slaying is directed to God), but it does not follow that, when the two are really distinct, the slaying of the sacrificial animal must be performed by the offering priest; it suffices that this be done at his command or under his direction. Sacrifices may be variously divided. Viewed in reference to the object, there are sacrifices of adoration, thanksgiving, petition, propitiation; in reference to the nature of the gift, sacrifices are either bloody or unbloody; in... reference to their complete or incomplete character, they are either absolute or relative. The former are complete and perfect in themselves; the latter are referred for their completeness and perfection to a sacrifice that is absolute. Revealed religion knows only one perfectly absolute sacrifice, that of the Cross, offered perpetually in the Mass; all others are referred to it as to their center either by a typical foreshadowing or by a mystical renewal.—C.E.; Pohle-Preuss, The Sacraments, II, St. L., 1922; Gihm, The Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, St. L., 1927.

Sacrifices in the Old Testament. The notion that God is honored by man if the latter, who is the king of all creation, offers to his Creator some of the beings which are nearer to him, is so natural that we find it put into practise from the very dawn of the history of mankind (Gen., 4). All ancient peoples, Semitic peoples included, whose institutions we know, offered sacrifices. The patriarchs acted in accordance with this custom; and when Moses, under God's direction, drew up the religious code of the Hebrews, he sanctioned the practise, only removing from it whatever elements were obviously adverse to the dignity of the Divine nature. Under the general name of sacrifices are included in the Mosaic worship two kinds of offerings, bloody and unbloody.

Bloody sacrifices consisted in the slaying of certain animals: ram (or he-lamb, or again ewe-lamb), goat, bull (or calf, or heifer), turtle-dove, and pigeon. Human sacrifices were absolutely banned from the worship of the true God. It is true that God declared that the first male child born in a family belonged to Him; but it should be redeemed, not slain. Human sacrifices among the Hebrews are always spoken of as an abomination committed by people contaminated through the influence of their pagan neighbors. The victim offered must be without blemish (Lev., 22; Mal., 1). The offerer led it to the entrance of the tabernacle or temple, and laid his hand upon its head, transferring thereby to it his intention of adoration, thanksgiving, atonement, or petition, as the case might be. The animal was then slain, regularly by the offerer, save in the case of birds, which were killed by the priest. The priest's office was to receive the blood of the victim and to offer it, pouring it round about the altar or anointing therewith some parts of the same altar. The true essence of the bloody sacrifice resided precisely in that oblation of the blood, for, as is explained in Leviticus, 17, by virtue of the life contained in the blood, which belongs to God, atonement is made by the application of that blood upon the altar. The fat covering the entrails, the two kidneys with their fat, the great lobe of the liver of all animals offered in sacrifice, and the fat tail of the rams were burned upon the altar; the other parts were disposed of in various ways according to the various sacrifices.

Four kinds of bloody sacrifices are enumerated.

(1) The most perfect, as well as the oldest and most usual was the holocaust, or whole burnt offering. The Hebrew ritual styled it 'olah (raising), because the whole victim, except the hide (which was given to the priests) and the hip muscle, was made to ascend to God in fire and smoke as an expression of man's absolute subjection to God. As the "perpetual oblation," it was offered twice daily, morning and evening. A holocaust accompanied likewise the cleansing of the leper, the purification after childbirth, the purification of the Nazir, etc. Private holocausts were frequent, and could be offered even at the instance of pagans (no imposition of hands then took place). Holocausts were offered by various Syrian kings, and Emperor Augustus ordered a daily whole burnt offering of two lambs and a steer in the Temple. The kind of victim offered depended not so much on the gravity of the offense as on the dignity of the person. The blood was rubbed on the horns of the altar of holocausts or the altar of incense, according to cases, then the remainder was poured out at the foot of the altar. The choice pieces (fat, kidneys, lobe of the liver) were burnt on the altar, and the rest eaten by the priests in the outer court.

(2) Sin-offering was intended to expiate misdeeds committed through ignorance, forgetfulness, or hastiness. Deliberate crimes were not so expiable; among these were reckoned the omission of circumcision, the desecration of the Sabbath, blasphemy, failure to celebrate the pasch, eating of blood, working or failure to fast on the Day of Atonement. The kind of victim offered depended not so much on the gravity of the offense as on the dignity of the person. The blood was rubbed on the horns of the altar of holocausts or the altar of incense, according to cases, then the remainder was poured out at the foot of the altar. The choice pieces (fat, kidneys, lobe of the liver) were burnt on the altar, and the rest eaten by the priests inside the holy place.

(3) Guilt-offering was especially appointed for transgressions demanding restitution. In addition to the restitution proper, which was taxed at six-fifths of the value of the thing concerned, a guilt-sacrifice had to be offered. This consisted of a ram, whose blood was sprinkled around the altar; the fatty portions were consumed on the altar of holocausts, and the rest of the flesh was eaten by the priests inside the holy place.

(4) Peace-offerings were either in thanksgiving or in fulfilment of a vow, or simply voluntary. The rite of these sacrifices contained two special features, the first of which was the remarkable ceremony of the "wave" and "heave," which the Talmud describes as follows: the priest, after cutting off the breast and right shoulder of the victim, placed the breast on the hands of the offerer, then, putting his own hands under those of this person, moved them backward and forward (wave) in token of the reciprocity in giving and receiving between God and the offerer. The same ceremony was then performed with the right shoulder, except that the motion of the hands (heave) was upward and downward. The breast and shoulder used in these ceremonies went to the priests and their families. The second special feature of this kind of sacrifice was that the remainder of the flesh went back to the offerer, who ate it with his friends near the sanctuary; guests, ceremonially clean, and the poor could be invited to these sacrificial meals. Should anything of a thanksgiving-offering remain after that, it should be burned; if, on the other hand, anything remained of a sacrifice for a vow or a free-will offering after the sacrificial meal, it could be eaten on the second day; but the remainder must be burned. To these various kinds of bloody sacrifices must be added that of the paschal lamb, and two others, of a rather extraordinary character, offered outside the sacred enclosure; viz., that of the red heifer, the...

Unbloody Sacrifices, more properly oblations, were, with the exception of incense, offerings of articles of solid or liquid food. They consisted of toasted ears of corn or shelled grain, and of the finest wheaten flour, both together with oil and incense, and also unleavened bread. All bread offered at the sanctuary had to be unleavened, except that made of the first-fruits and presented at the Pentecost, and the bread offered with thanksgiving-sacrifices; even these were not brought to the altar but went to the priests. All food-offerings prepared from corn were seasoned with salt; honey was banned from all sacrifices. These food-offerings accompanied every holocaust and peace-offering, but never sacrifices for sin or guilt, save at the cleansing of a leper. They were also on occasions offered by themselves. Oil and wine were the only liquid articles used in connection with sacrifices, and were never offered independently. Oil entered into the preparation of the bread; some also was burned with the other gifts on the altar; wine was poured out as a libation before the altar.—C.E., XIII, 312; Seisenberger, tr. Buchanan, Practical Handbook for the Study of the Bible, N. Y., 1911.

Sacrilege (Lat., sacrar, sacred; legere, to purloin) is the violation or irreverent treatment of sacred persons, places, or things. To be a sacrilege, this violation or irreverent treatment must touch that formality in the object by which it is sacred. Sacrilege is a sin opposed to the virtue of religion, and as such is a grave sin in grave matter. The definition suggests the threefold division of sacrilege; viz., personal, an irreverent treatment of sacred persons, such as the violent laying of hands on clerics or religious; local, a violation of a sacred place, such as committing certain crimes, as homicide in a church; real, a violation of sacred things, such as the unworthy reception of a sacrament of the living, or simony.—C.E.; Spelman, The History and Fate of Sacrilege, Lond., 1888.

Sacrifices, a Jewish sect, contemporary with Jesus Christ. Their nature is made known to us solely by the N.T., the Talmud, and Flavius Josephus. St. Matthew (22) relates, “Now on that day there came to him Sadducees, who say that there is no resurrection.” Acts (23), “For the Sadducees say that there is no resurrection, neither angel nor spirit: but the Pharisees confess both.” This doctrinal divergence generated a deadly hatred between the two sects; yet they conspired against Jesus. Flavius Josephus (Antig., 18), “But the doctrine of the Sadducees is this: that souls die with the bodies, nor do they regard the observation of anything besides what the law enjoins them; for they think it an instance of virtue to dispute with those doctors of philosophy whom they frequent. Their doctrine is received but by a few, yet by those of the greatest dignity.”—C.E.; Gigot.

Sadler, Mary Anne Madden (1820-1903), writer, b. Cootehill, Ireland; d. Montreal. She emigrated to Montreal, 1844, and in 1846 married James Sadlier of the publishing house of D. J. Sadlier and Co. Among her works are: “The Blakes and Flanagans,” “Bessie Conway,” “Aunt Honor’s Keepsake,” and “The Red Hand of Ulster.”—C.E.

Sadness is a kind of pain caused by an interior apprehension, through our sensitive appetite, of some evil that affects us. This interior apprehension extends to more objects than the exterior, which causes pain but not sorrow, since it can perceive the present, past, and future, while the latter only regards something present. The proper object of sadness is one’s own pain or loss, as distinct from that of pity which is sorrow for another’s pain and loss, and from that of envy which is sorrow at another’s good.

Sadoc (Heb., just) made high priest by David while Abiathar was high priest in Jerusalem (2 Kings, 8). During Absalom’s revolt, he brought the Ark back to Jerusalem (1 Kings, 15 and 19). To foil Adonias’ plans, he anointed Solomon king ‘before David’s death (3 Kings, 1), and as a reward was appointed sole high priest (id., 2).

Sagard, Théodore Gabriel (17th century), Recollect lay brother, missionary, and historian, b. France. He was sent on the Huron mission in Canada, 1623, soon won the affection of his neophytes and when sent back to France persuaded his superiors that a more powerful order should be introduced. They requested the Jesuits to take the mission. He presented a memoir concerning the state of religion to the Viceroy of New France. His history of Canada gives a clear account of the Recollect missions.—C.E.

Sahagun, Bernabé de (c. 1500-90), Franciscan missionary and Aztec archaeologist, b. Sahagún, Spain; d. Mexico. He was one of the earliest missionaries to Mexico; became proficient in Aztec and, directed by his superior, compiled in Aztec a history of Aztec customs and legends in twelve manuscript books. He also compiled a grammar and dictionary of the Aztec language.—C.E.

Saint Abb's Head. See ETHA THE ELDER.

Saint Agnes College, Memphis, Tenn., founded, 1922; conducted by the Sisters of Saint Dominic; preparatory school; college of arts and sciences; special courses; summer school; professors, 8; students, 45.

Saint Albans, Abbey of, Hertfordshire, England, founded c. 793 by Offa, King of the Mercians. In 1077 Abbot Paul of Caen undertook the work of rebuilding; this was completed in 11 years and large parts of the structure still exist. The abbey was confiscated by Henry VIII, 1530, but escaped destruction. Matthew Paris is probably the most famous monk of the foundation. In the late 19th century Lord Grimthorpe, at his own expense, undertook the restoration of the buildings, with unfortunate results.—C.E.

Saint Aloysius College, Glasgow; an offshoot of Stonyhurst, founded 1859, by the Jesuits; professors, 24; students, 580.

Saint Ambrose College, Davenport, Ia., founded 1882; conducted by the diocesan clergy; preparatory school; college of arts and sciences; summer school; professors, 19; students, 191; degrees conferred in 1929, 19.

Saint Andrews, Priory of, Scotland, supposed to have been founded by Angus, King of the Picts (735-747); administered by the Culdee, later by canons regular from Scone. Its dependencies were: Lochleven, Monynusk, Isle of May, Pittenweem, Portmoak, and Kilrimont. The University of St. Andrews owes its existence to the canons of St. Andrews. The priory and cathedral were destroyed by fire during the Reformation.—C.E.

Saint Andrews, University of, St. Andrews, Fife, founded 1411, by Henry Wardlaw, Bp. of St. Andrews, 1411; erected by Bull of the antipope Benedict XIII, whose claims Scotland supported. It comprised three colleges: St. Salvador, founded 1450, by Bp. James Kennedy, confirmed by Pope Nicholas V; St. Leonard's, founded, by Abp. Stuart, and Prior Hepburn, 1512; and St. Mary's, founded by Abp. J. Beaton, 1537, confirmed by Pope Paul III, 1538, today the divinity college of the university. The colleges escaped when the priory (erade of the university), and the churches were destroyed at the Reformation. St. Salvador's and St. Leonard's were amalgamated, 1747, and are now known as the United Colleges. University College, Dundee, incorporated 1887, houses the scientific departments. The Marquess of Bute, Catholic benefactor of the university, and lord rector, 1892-98, proposed to affiliate the Catholic Seminary of Blairs College, Aberdeen, but was unsuccessful. Gavin Douglas (c. 1474-1532), Bishop of Dunkeld, poet, was an early pupil. The university is co-educational; it includes faculties of divinity, medicine, arts, science, and law; professors, 119; students, 781.—Rashdall, Universities of Europe in the Middle Ages, Oxford, 1895; C.E.
States. Saint Francis Borgia sent Jesuits in 1566; in 1577 Franciscans arrived. In 1580 Drake attacked the town unsuccessfully. The general massacre of 1597 was a severe check to missionary work but after the baptism of Indian chiefs in 1609 the missions flourished again. By 1674 there were evidences of decline and universal ignorance of Catholic doctrine, due to internal dissension and English hostility. Partially revived in 1720, Florida's ancient Catholicity was obliterated in 1763 when Spain ceded Florida to England. Religion suffered irreparably when the English attempted to populate the country and develop its resources.

Saint Augustine, Diocese of, Florida; vicariate apostolic, 1857; diocese, 1870; embraces the State of Florida east of the Apalachicola River; area, 46,929; suffragan of Baltimore. Bishops: Augustin Verot (1858-61 and 1870-76); John Moore (1877-1901); William John Kenny (1902-13); M. J. Curley (1913-21); Patrick Barry (1922). Charches, 94; priests, secular, 52; priests, regular, 41; religious women, 189; colleges, 2; academies and high schools, 27; parochial schools, about 20; pupils in parochial schools, about 6414; institutions, 4; Catholics, 51,014.

Saint Augustine Abbey, Benedictine monastery founded outside the city of Canterbury, 605, dedicated anew to Sts. Peter, Paul, and Augustine by St. Dunstan, 978; suppressed, 1538.-C.E.

Saint Bartholomew's Day, name given to the massacre of Protestants which occurred in Paris on the Feast of Saint Bartholomew, 24 Aug., 1572, and in the French provinces during the ensuing weeks. The majority of historians deny that the Holy See was the accomplice of the French court in this outrage. The idea of a summary execution of the Protestant leaders, which would end the discord that had caused three civil wars in France (1562-63, 1567-68, 1569-70), had long existed in the mind of Catherine de' Medici. As early as 1560 Michaelis Suriano, the Venetian ambassador, wrote that Francis II wanted to fall upon the Protestant leaders and punish them without mercy; in 1569 Parliament offered a reward to whomever would apprehend the Admiral Coligny, leader of the Calvinist party. In 1572 Coligny, with money given to him by Charles IX, unknown to Catherine, sent 4000 men to the relief of Mons, which was at the time besieged by the Duke of Alva. Then he demanded war with Spain, saying that if it were not declared, another war might be expected. From this Catherine deduced that France was threatened with another civil war, the fourth in ten years. These threats and the failure of the attack on Coligny impelled Catherine to try to avert this war by organizing a massacre of the Protestants. The first rumor of what had occurred on St. Bartholomew's Day reached Rome, 2 Sept., and Gregory XIII received the impression that Charles IX and his family had been saved from great danger and escaped a terrible conspiracy. His attitude changed when he was better informed, although the Holy See, like all Europe and many Frenchmen, believed in the existence of a Huguenot conspiracy.—C.E.

Saint Bede Abbey, Peru, III., founded by the Benedictines; abbey since 1910. Conducts a seminary and college; abbots, 2; faculty, 33; pupils, 200.

Saint Bede's College, Manchester, England, founded 1876 by Cardinal Vaughan assisted by Bishop Casartelli, has commercial and classical schools and is a center of Catholic life in England. It is conducted by priests and lay professors; faculty, 9.

Saint Benedict, Medal of, originally in the form of a cross, dedicated to the devotion in honor of St. Benedict. Its origin is doubtful. In an old manuscript of 1415, was found a picture representing St. Benedict holding in one hand a staff which ends in a cross, and in the other a scroll. On the staff and scroll were written inscriptions, the initials of which now appear on the medal. These medals which also bear an image of St. Benedict, and a cross, began to be made in Germany about this time and soon spread over Europe. They were first approved by Benedict XIV in his briefs of 1741 and 1742.—C.E.

Saint Benedict's Abbey, and seminary, Mt. Angel, Ore., founded by the Benedictines, 1882. Priests, 40; faculty, 36; pupils in seminary, 48.

Saint Benedict's Abbey, Atchison, Kansas, founded by the Benedictines, 1877, abbey since 1876. Connected with it are a college (students, 217), high school (students, 235), scholasticate, Benedictine and diocesan seminaries. Faculty, 31.

Saint Bernard, Great and Little, two hospices in the Alps, established by St. Bernard of Menthon in the 10th century. The Canons Regular of St. Augustine, in charge of the institutions, are renowned for the hospitality and aid they used to extend to travelers of the Great and Little St. Bernard mountains, named for the founder of the monasteries. The St. Bernard dogs used by the monks are famous. Now that the dangers of climbing these mountains are not so great, the canons are free to devote themselves to other occupations.

Saint Bonaventure, College of, Quaracchi, Italy, famous as the center of literary activity in the Order of Friars Minor; founded 1274, by Mgr. Bernardino del Vigo, Abp. of Sardis. The "Acta Ordinis," a monthly in Latin, and the new "Archivium Francisco-Historicum" are published here.—C.E.

Saint Bonaventure's College, Allegany, N. Y., founded 1859; conducted by the Franciscan Fathers; preparatory school; colleges of arts and sciences, education; graduate and summer schools; faculty, 54; students, 490; degrees conferred in 1929, 143.

Saint Bonaventure's College, St. John's, Newfoundland, founded 1893; conducted by the Irish Christian Brothers; affiliated with London University; faculty, 14; students, 480.
Saint Bonaventure's Monastery and Ecclesiastical Seminary, Allegany, N. Y., founded, 1855; conducted by the Franciscan Fathers; for seculars and Franciscans; faculty, 36; seminarians, 195.

Saint-Cyr, Abbé de, title in commendam of Jean Duvérier de Laboranne (1581-1643), b. Bayonne, France; d. Paris. He was a life-long friend of Cornelius Jansen, the author of the "Augustinus," and with him planned to introduce innovations in the dogmas and moral practices of the Church. He led many eminent men to support the movement at its inception, some, like St. Vincent de Paul, being at first attracted by his asceticism. He was imprisoned by Richelieu, but not so closely that he could not carry on his propaganda.

He was a prolific writer and his collected works were published at Lyons, 1679.—C.E., V, 218.

Saint David's, ancient diocese, Wales, founded by St. David, patron saint of Wales. From the 7th to the 11th centuries it asserted metropolitan jurisdiction over South Wales, the town, a celebrated place of pilgrimage, being the leading religious center of Wales for upwards of 1000 years. The diocese eventually came under the episcopal jurisdiction of Canterbury.

Saint David's Home, Ealing, London, occupies a unique place in the charitable institutions of England, it being specially devoted to the care of soldiers and sailors permanently and totally disabled in the World War. The home owes its foundation to Lady Anne Kerr, O.B.E., with whom, among others, but in a more practical manner, was associated Mrs. Cicely Passmore. The scheme as originally envisaged involved the expenditure of £25,000, but further developments became imperative. Kent House, formerly a royal residence, was bought and adapted, and opened in 1918. Since then, so successful has been the nursing under Catholic control of these permanent sufferers of the war, that the British Government authorities have encouraged the committee to make considerable extensions, and now with chapel, memorial cloister, and garden, St. David's Home is the best equipped institution of its kind in England. The nursing is extremely arduous, as from the nature of the cases, physical improvement or recovery is not generally to be expected, though some notable recoveries have been recorded. While the maintenance of the patients is provided for by the ministry of pensions, the building and equipment of the home have been largely defrayed by small contributions from the (principally Catholic) public. There is no religious discrimination with regard to the patients admitted; men of any creed, or none, are welcome and receive the same untiring care and solicitude from the Sisters of Charity who are in charge of the home, now accommodating 54 patients. (E. v. w.)

Saint-Denis Abbey, near Paris, founded 650, by King Dagobert for Benedictine monks, possessing the shrine of St. Denis, became one of the richest and most important abbeys in France. Sugeter, thirty-sixth abbot, was perhaps the most famous among them. The present building was begun, 1140. In 1633 it was united to the Congregation of St.-Maur. Louis XVI confiscated the abbacy and united the monastery to the house of St-Cyr. Dissolved at the Revolution, and restored under Napoleon III, it is now a "national monument."—C.E.

Saint Edmund's College, Ware, England, established as Old Hall Green Academy, 1769; reconstructed and chartered as St. Edmund's College, 1793, by Bp. Douglass to continue the work of Douai in southern England. In 1869 it became simply a school for boys but was restored as a theological seminary by Abp. Bourne, 1905. After the World War the existing buildings were repaired and new schools and halls were added.—C.E., XI, 229.

Saint Edward's University, Austin, Tex., founded 1881; conducted by the Congregation of the Holy Cross; preparatory school; college of arts and sciences; faculty, 19; students, 176; degrees conferred in 1929, 19.

Sainte-Geneviève, Abbey of, founded in Paris by Clovis who established there a college of clerics, later canonic; regular. With Notre Dame and St. Genevieve's the cradle of the University of Paris. Following the reforms instituted by Charles Faure, at the instance of Card. de La Rochehoncauld, early in the 17th century, St. Genevieve's renascence produced many distinguished sons. Abbey and school were closed, 1790, after the Revolutionary Assembly.

Saint Elizabeth, College of, Convent Station, N. J., founded 1899; conducted by the Sisters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul (Newark); preparatory school; college of arts and sciences; professors, 35; students, 302; degrees conferred in 1929, 71.

Saint Emmeram, Abbey of, a former Benedictine monastery at Regensburg, Germany, traditionally founded by St. Emmeram, probably c. 652, and enlarged and endowed by Charlemagne, c. 800. The abbots ranked as princes of the Empire and had a seat in the imperial diets. Early in the 19th century the monastery was confiscated and the buildings appropriated as a residence for the Prince of Thurn and Taxis.

Saint Francis Xavier’s College, University of, Antigonish, Nova Scotia, founded, 1855; conducted by the diocesan clergy; faculty of arts and science; preparatory school; professors, 20; students, 329; degrees conferred in 1929, 33.

Saint Gall, Abbey of, a Benedictine abbey 30 m. sw. of Constance, Switzerland, established c. 613, by Othmar, its first abbot. Charles Martel and Pepin, on the site occupied by the cell of Gallus, disciple of St. Columbanus. Its schools and library were numbered among the most celebrated of Europe. The 13th century saw a period of decline at the monastery, and the abbots became princes of the empire. The library suffered at the hands of the Humanists (14th century) and the Calvinists (16th century) who removed many valuable manuscripts and books, but in 1530 Abbot Diethelm instituted a noteworthy restoration. Pillaged by the Swiss, 1712, and again rebuilt, in 1798 it was secularized. The abbey church became the cathedral of the Diocese of St. Gall, 1846. —C.E., VI, 347.

Saint George’s, Diocese of, Newfoundland, in 1870 the western portion of the island of New­foundland was raised to the status of a diocese. In 1892, raised to a vicariate-apostolic; the boundary line of the old prefecture was removed eastward to Garnish, thus including Borgeo Bay d’Espoir and Fortune Bay; diocese, 1904; suffragan of St. John’s, N.F.L. Bishops: T. Sears (1871-85); M. F. Howley (1892-94); Neil McNeil (1895-1910); Michael F. Power (1911-20); H. T. Renaud; Maxine Cheeles (1920-24); Churches, 38; priests, 14; convents, 5; schools, 85; Catholics, 18,545.

Saint Gregory, Society of, founded in England on St. Gregory’s day, 1929, by Rev. J. B. McLell­gott, O.S.B.; composed of persons interested in ecclesiastical music. Its principal aim is to main­tain the dignity of the Sacred Liturgy as an instru­ment of congregational worship, by fulfilling the wishes of Popes Pius X and XI as expressed in the “Motu Proprio” of the former (22 Nov., 1903), and the “Apostolic Constitution” (28 Dec., 1928) of the latter. Its further purpose is to give instruction in plainsong and polyphony to choirmasters, teachers, and others, and to this end courses and summer schools are established (see v. w.)

Saint Ignatius’ College, Stamford Hill, Lon­don, a secondary day school for boys, founded 1894, by the Jesuits, at the request of Card. Vaughan, and enlarged in 1907. Faculty, 15.

Saint Isidore, College of, Rome, originally founded for Spanish Franciscans during the pontificate of Gregory XV. Father Luke Wadding converted it into a college for the education of Irish Franciscan students, 1625. It was suppressed, 1798, but later restored and reopened with a fresh band of students from Ireland, 1819. Since then it has been in the possession of the Irish Franciscans. —C.E.

Saint James of Compostela (SANTIAGO DE LA ESPADA), Order of, founded in the 12th century to fight the Moors. Léon and Ucles in Castile both claim its birth, but after the union of the two crowns Ucles became the headquarters of the order. The rule of Saint Augustine was adopted and Alex­ander III recognized it as a religious order, 1175. It comprised several classes: canons, who administered the sacraments; canonesses, to serve pilgrims; religious knights and married knights. Marriage required the king's authorization and during Advent, Lent, and on certain festivals the knights lived in their monasteries, observing continence. The order extended into Portugal, France, Italy, Hungary, and Palestine, and at one time comprised 83 commanderies, 2 cities, 178 boroughs and villages, 200 parishes, 5 hospitals, 5 convents and 1 college; it numbered 400 knights and could muster over 1000 lances. The order waged war separately and with the royal army, finally joining the maritime expeditions; the unhappy part it took in the dissensions among the Christians of Spain caused several schisms among its members. Authority was vested in a grand master and Council of Thirteen, the Council electing the master and having the privilege of deposing him. Pedro Fernandez de Fuente Encalato, the first master (d. 1184), was followed by 39 successors; in 1499, the pope made Ferdinand the Catholic administrator of the order, and under Charles V the three orders, Alcántara, Calatrava, and Santiago, were united to the crown of Spain. The insignia was a red cross terminating in a sword.—C.E.

Saint John's Social and Political Alliance (formerly The Catholic Women's Suffrage Society), a non-party organization founded in London, England, by Gabrielle Jeffery and May Kendall, 1911, "to band together Catholics of both sexes, in order to secure for women the Parliamentary Vote on the same terms as it is, or may be, granted to men." When partial enfranchisement for British women was won in 1918, the object was extended "to secure the political, social, and economic quality between men and women, and to further the work and usefulness of Catholic women as citizens." It was affiliated to the International Woman Suffrage Alliance in 1920. Its organ is "The Catholic Citizen," published monthly. (E. v. w.)

St. John, Ambrose (1815-75), Oratorian, d. Edgbaston, Birmingham, England. He was educated at Westminster School, and graduated at Christ Church, Oxford, where he formed a lifelong friendship with Newman. He was received into the Church Sept., 1845, and ordained at Rome. He joined the Oratorians, and devoted himself entirely to missionary work, to the Oratory and its famous school. An excellent classical scholar and a remarkable European and Oriental linguist, his death was caused by overwork in translating Fessler's book on infallibility. Newman paid him an affectionate tribute in his "Apologia."—C.E.

Churches, 97; priests, secular, 75; priests, regular, 26; religious women, 285; college, 1; academies, 4; convents, 12; institutions, 7; Catholics (app.), 65,000.

Saint John Lateran, the Basilica of, the oldest and first in rank of the four basilicas of Rome. The name is derived from the Lateran family, on the site of whose palace the basilica stands. Constantine presented this palace to the Church. The original church building, probably adapted from the hall of the palace, was dedicated to the Saviour, and from its splendor was known as the Basilica Aures. Though several times destroyed and rebuilt, the basilica retained its ancient form, being divided by rows of columns into aisles and having an atrium with colonnades. The tasteless restoration of the 17th century changed its appearance. A monastery was formerly between the basilica and the city wall of which the cloister still remains. The original apse survived until 1878, when it was destroyed and a deeper apse built. The ancient mosaics have been preserved. The high altar, which is of wood and is believed to have been used by St. Peter, is now encased in marble. In the upper part of the basilica are the heads of the Apostles, Peter and Paul. The baptistery is an octagonal edifice with porphyry columns. The font is of green basalt. This basilica has been the cathedral of Rome since the 4th century.

Saint John's Seminary, Wonersh, England. This college, founded by the Rt. Rev. John Butt, fourth Bp. of Southwark, is the earliest establishment in England designed to fulfill the wishes of the Council of Trent. The building, commenced in 1889, was opened 8 Sept., 1901, and during the interval a temporary home was found for the first students of the seminary at Henfield Place, Henfield, Sussex. The rector was Fr. Francis Bourne, later cardinal. In a few years the number of students rose to 100, and it was found necessary to establish the school at Hyde House, Clapham Park. This school did not survive long, and after the World War II the rector was appointed dean of Southwark. The College of St. Joseph at Mark Cross, Sussex, for the boys in humanities. St. John's, Wonesh, became then a house of philosophy, theology, and the allied sciences only. Professors, 6; students, 90; priests ordained, over 260.—Bourne, Eccl. Training, Lond., 1927.

Y.; moved to Fordham, 1841, and known as St. John's Seminary. In 1864 it was established at Troy, N. Y., under its former title, and in 1896 was removed to its present location, under the supervision of the Sulpician Fathers. The secular clergy assumed control of the courses of study, 1906. Faculty, 15; students, 234.

Saint Joseph's Society for Foreign Missions (Mill Hill), founded as a missionary college at Mill Hill, 10 m. N. of London, by Herbert Cardi­ nal Vaughan while still a priest, 1866; approved 1891; constitutions definitely approved 1906. A pre­paratory school, St. Peter's, at Freshfield, near Liverpool, was founded in 1884. Two other branch colleges are at Rozendaal, Holland, and Brixen, Tyrol. At Mill Hill a two years' course in philosophy and four in theology prepares the students for evangelizing the natives of English colonies and protectorates, which is their proper field. The following are under their care: the Telugu mission, Madras, British India; the Prefecture Apostolic of Labuan and North Borneo; the Maori Mission, Auckland, New Zealand; the Prefecture Apostolic of Kafiristan and Kashmir, north of India; the Vicariate Apostolic of Uganda, British East Africa; stations in the Belgian Congo and in the Philippine Islands. In addition to being teachers, the brothers are engaged as missionaries, the rest as teachers at home. There are also lay brothers. A procure for the missions is at Rome.

Saint Joseph's Society of the Sacred Heart (for Colored Missions; Josephite Fathers) began its labors 1871, when four priests from Mill Hill were assigned to St. Francis Xavier's Church at Baltimore with a congregation of colored Catho­lics. It became independent of Mill Hill, 1892, and, under its present title, established its headquarters at Baltimore. The society is composed of secular priests laboring exclusively for the conversion of the Negro race in the United States. It is established in the archdioceses of New York, Baltimore, New Orleans, and San Antonio, and in the dioceses of Dallas, Galveston, Little Rock, Mobile, Nashville, Natchez, Raleigh, Richmond, Toledo, Wilmington, and St. Augustine. The society conducts St. Joseph's Seminary, Baltimore; Epiphany Apostolic College, Newburgh, N. Y.; St. Joseph's Industrial School, Clayton, Del., and an agricultural trade school for colored boys. Statistics (approximately): 50 parishes; 24 missions; 51 parochial grammar schools; 84 Fathers; 44 seminarians; 85 students; 3 brothers; over 8600 colored pupils. "The Colored Harvest," published bi-monthly at Baltimore, is the official organ of the society.—C.E., VIII, 521; C.E. Suppl., 663.

Leavenworth, St. Joseph, and Wichita; present archbishop, Most Reverend John Joseph Glennon.

St. Louis, city, Missouri. During its earliest history, St. Louis belonged to the diocese of Santiago de Cuba, and formed part of a vast territory served by only two priests. Upon the death of the Recollect, Fr. Collet, 1765, Fr. P. Giaud was sent by the Bp. of Quebec to assist the Jesuit Fr. Meurin. The records show two baptisms administered the following year, a tent being used for want of a church; four years later the first church was dedicated. A band of Capuchins who arrived, 1772, supplied the first resident priest, Fr. Valentine. As a result of the opposition confronting Bp. Du Bourg of Louisiana after his consecration, he moved his residence to St. Louis, 1818, and took possession of the poor wooden structure which served as pro-cathedral. The same year he founded the Latin Academy, later the University of St. Louis, and the Religious of the Sacred Heart arrived from France to take up the education of girls, making their first foundation in St. Charles. However, the poverty of the parish had become so intense by 1822 that the church property, including the parochial residence, had to be sold. The purchaser allowed the bishop the privilege of redeeming it, and an appeal for funds was made in Europe. The city was raised to an episcopal see, 1826, with Rt. Rev. Joseph Rosati as incumbent, and three years later the Sisters of Charity founded a hospital which did noble work during the cholera epidemic of 1849, caring for 1330 patients, and sacrificing two sisters. From 1843 when there were only 3 churches, the Catholics made rapid progress and by 1860 the city counted 58 parish churches, among them a cathedral, consecrated, 1834. Various religious orders came to assist the bishop; Sisters of St. Joseph, 1836; Visitations Nuns, 1844; Ursulines Nuns, 1848, and the Christian Brothers, who, by 1852 had charge of five schools. Upon the accession of Bp. Kenrick, 1843, the city had a Catholic population of 16,000, and in 1847 it was raised to an arch-episcopal see. The cornerstone of a new cathedral was laid in 1908; Byzantine in feeling, it is developed in gray granite, with an interior of pure Byzantine style in which fine light-and-shadow effects have been obtained. According to 1929 statistics, St. Louis has a Catholic population of about 350,000, served by 103 parish churches.

Saint Louis Roman Catholic Theological Seminary (Kenrick Seminary), St. Louis, Mo., founded, 1818, in charge of the Vincentians. Faculty, 12; students, 225.

Saint Lucia, Island of, dependency of the British Empire, in the British West Indies, administered by a nominated executive and partly nominated and partly elected legislative council; area, 233 sq. m.; pop., 53,698. Christianity was introduced into Saint Lucia by the Spanish discoverers, and the first preachers of the Faith were the Dominicans who labored here until the British occupation, when the secular clergy were placed in charge. Saint Lucia belongs to the Archdiocese of Port of Spain (q.v.) on the Island of Trinidad, B.W.I.

Saint Malo, fortified seaport in Ille-et-Vilaine, western France, situated on a granite island communicating with the mainland by a causeway, “Sillon,” famous for its cathedral (12th century) and castle (15th century). In the 6th century a monastery on the island sheltered Malo, a Cambrian priest from Wales, afterwards Bp. of Aleth (St. Servan). It became a see in the 12th century and henceforth the bishops of the town claimed temporal sovereignty which was disputed by the dukes of Brittany. A college existed here from 1611 to 1661; the monastery of Saint Malo founded at the same time. A Congregation in 1672. Saint Malo was bombarded by the English in 1693, 1695, 1758. It lost its bishopric in 1801.

Saint Martin’s Abbey, Lacey, Wash.; founded by the Benedictines, 1895; abbey since 1914. Conducts a college; students, 220; priests, 35; parishes, 7; missions, 12.

Saint Mary Major, the Liberian Basilica, one of the principal patriarchal basilicas in Rome, dates from the 4th century. It is adorned with interesting mosaics of biblical subjects, and on the two sides are two chapels with cupolas. The baldaquin of the high altar is supported by four prophecy columns.

Saint Omer (St. Omer's or St. Omer's’s), Jesuit college, founded by Father Parsons, S.J., in 1592 or 1593, for the education of English youth during the Elizabethan persecution; located in the Province of Artois, at that time subject to the King of Spain. In 1678 Artois became a French possession and the college prospered under the friendly government until 1762 when the Parliament of Paris expelled all Jesuits from France. The school was moved to Bruges and work continued until the suppression of the Society, 1773.—C.E.

Saint Patrick's Breastplate, a beautiful prayer composed by St. Patrick and universally accepted as genuine. It was written in preparation for the saint's appearance at Tara before the assembled chieftains of Ireland, on Easter Sunday, 433, when the final blow was given to Druidism, and the triumph of Christianity completed.—C.E., XI, 555.

Saint Patrick's Seminary, Menlo Park, California; founded, 1898; conducted by Sulpicians. Faculty, 10; students, 145.

Saint Paul's Outside the Walls, one of the four great basilicas of Rome, and an abbey nullius. Though originating as early as A.D. 200 the basilica was not completed till 395. It was destroyed by fire 1823; the whole world contributed to its restoration which was completed, 1844. In 1891 the stained glass in the basilica was shattered by an explosion. Martin V (1417-31) entrusted the monastery to the monks of the Congregation of Monte Cassino, 1425; it was then made an abbey nullius.—C.E., XIII, 309.

Saint Paul's School, Hammersmith, London, noted English public school, founded, 1509, and endowed with his entire patrimony by John Colet (q.v.); erected within the precincts of St. Paul's cathedral, near the site of an older foundation (c. 1111) which St. Thomas Becket, it is said, attended; the largest free grammar school in England, it was to provide a sound Christian education; Greek was to have equal standing with Latin. William Lilly, first rector, was the pioneer Greek educator in England. Ven. George Nichols, martyr, was an usher, and, after the Reformation, when the school became Protestant, John Milton was a noted scholar. The school was removed 1876 to Hammersmith. In 1929 it counted 675 pupils. —Lupton, Life of John Colet, Lond., 1887.

Saint Peter, Abbey Nullius of, Muenster, Saskatchewan; founded in Illinois, 1892, as St. Peter's Priory, transferred to Muenster, 1903, erected into an abbey, 1911, made an Abbey Nullius, 1921; comprises the 50 townships which constitute St. Peter's Colony; area, 1800 sq. m.; suffragan of Regina. Abbots: Michael Ott, O.S.B. (1921-36); Severin Gertken, O.S.B. (1827). Churches, 14; priests, regular, 30; religious women, 109; seminary, 1; college, 1; parochial schools, 9; separate schools, 2; institutions (hospitals), 2; Catholics, 10,000.

Saint Peter in Chains, Feast of, 1 Aug., originally kept in Rome to commemorate the dedication of the Church of St. Peter on the Esquiline Hill built by Eudoxia Licinia, 442, and rebuilt by Adrian I in the 8th century. When the chains which St. Peter had worn in prison were later venerated there, the feast received its present name. The date when these chains were brought from Jerusalem is disputed; some claim they were brought in 116 by travelers sent in search of them by St. Balbina and her father St. Quirinus, while others think St. Eudoxia brought them in 439. St. Adrian I in the 8th century. When thechains were later venerated there, the feast recei ved its present name.

Saint Peter's Basilica, Rome, church located on the site of the Neronian circus; it contains an altar which marks the traditional spot of St. Peter's crucifixion. Under Constantine the simple sanctuary erected on this spot gave way to a magnificent basilica, partly demolished 12 centuries later; its rebuilding during the early Renaissance is regrettable, as the plans were garbled by successive popes and their architects, Michelangelo finally preserving, to some extent, Bramante's original plan. There were three notable stages in its construction: Bramante's ground plan of a Greek cross with dome; Michelangelo's Greek cross with dome, plus a vestibule with a portico of columns; and Paul V's Latin cross with Baroque façade. The longer they built, the more the original magnificent plans were spoiled, so that the present exterior of the structure, begun 1450, and finished 1626, is on the whole, esthetically unsatisfactory, chiefly because the extension of the nave conceals Michelangelo's dome and the division of the cloister range. The façade, the work of Maderna and Bernini, has five portals; all exterior walls are constructed of mellowed golden travertine giving a harmonious effect to the structure, which has four principal divisions extending from the dome. The tomb of St. Peter is in the center of the entire edifice which, in addition to the principal altar, has 33 other altars, under most of which repose bodies of the saints, including several apostles. The covered colonnades of Doric columns which enclose the beautiful piazza, form an integral part of the basilica; these are surmounted by 162 images of saints, after Bernini; the celebrated obelisk of Heliopolis stands in the center of the ellipse. The interior of St. Peter's abounds in treasures of art, celebrated tombs, and places of historic note; the chambers beneath the pavement contain the graves of many popes and emperors. Since 1870 important papal functions have usually taken place here. The basilica accommodates 50,000.—C.E.

Saint Procopius' Abbey, Lisle, Ill., founded in Chicago, 1887, by Rt. Rev. Boniface Wimmer, O.S.B.; raised to an abbey, 1894; moved to Lisle, 1915. The Benedictines conduct St. Procopius College (founded, 1890) with preparatory school and courses in arts and sciences; professors, 27; students, 230; degrees conferred in 1929, 10.

Saint Rose, College of, Albany, N. Y.; conducted by the Sisters of St. Joseph of Carondelet, college of arts and sciences; professors, 19; students, 189; degrees conferred in 1929, 44.

Saints (Lat., sanctus, holy), name applied in the N.T. to the members of the Christian community generally, as in Colossians, 1, "To the saints and faithful brethren in Christ Jesus, who are at Colossa"; but early restricted to men and women of eminent holiness of life. In its strictest ecclesiastical usage it applies only to those who have distinguished themselves by heroic virtue and who, after the scrutiny of the Church, have been declared saints by a solemn judgment of the pope. The juridical consequence of such declaration entitles the person to receive general veneration (not adoration) in the universal Church. The earliest class of saints to receive distinct recognition was the martyrs; the name "confessors" originally applied to those who evinced signal courage and constancy in professing the faith, but now refers to male saints who are not martyrs or sufferers for the faith; women are venerated either as virgins, virgin-martyrs, or as widows.—Holweck, Biographical Dictionary of the Saints, St. L., 1924; Delehaye, Sanctus, Brussels, 1927. Saint Sulpice, name of a church in Paris and a famous seminary, now at Issy. The Church was begun during the reign of Louis XIV (1643-1715), according to plans of architects Gamard, Levau, and Gittard, and completed near the middle of the 18th century by Servandoni (1685-1760). During the Revolution it was made a "Temple of Victory," 1793, and was later used by the Theophilanthropists. The seminary was founded 1642 by Father Olier as a national training school for French priests. In 1814, due to anti-clerical legislation, it was transferred to Issy.—C.E.

Saints Vincent and Anastasius, Abbey of, a Cistercian monastery near Rome. Three sanctuaries belong to the abbey: the church of St. Paul of Three Fountains, built on the site where St. Paul was beheaded; Our Lady of Martyrs, erected over the relics of St. Zeno and his legionaries; and the church and monastery of Sts. Vincent and Anastasius, dating from 626, when it was given to the Benedictines. In the course of its history the church has been changed in various ways and was taken over by a community from La Grande Trappe, 1868. They successfully introduced modern methods of combating malarial conditions which had previously existed there.—C.E., XIII, 380.

Saint Sylvester, Order of, a papal order of knighthood known, prior to 1914, as the Militia of the Golden Spur or Golden Militia. It was placed under the patronage of St. Sylvester by Gregory XVI who checked the lavish bestowal of decorations which was causing the prestige of the order to diminish, and divided it into two classes, commanders, and knights. By the regulations of Pius X, 9 Feb., 1906, the order was divided into: (a) the Order of St. Sylvester; (b) Order of the Golden Militia or Golden Spur. The classes were increased to three: Knights Grand Cross, Commanders, and Knights. The present decoration consists of a gold cross with a white enamelled surface in whose center is the image of St. Sylvester P.M., encircled by the inscription "Sanc Sylvester P.M." in letters of gold on blue enamel; to the reverse side of the medal bears the pontifical emblem with the dates MDCCxxxxx and MDCCCCCV, the former dating the Gregorian restoration, the latter its renovation by Pius X. The ribbon of the decoration is black silk bordered with red. The cross of the order attached to a silver star comprises the decoration. The official costume is a black coat ornamented with one row of gilt buttons, black velvet, gold-embroidered collar and cuffs, black gold-striped trousers, a bicornered silk hat with a cockade of the papal colors to which is added a white plume when worn by a grand cross knight, a black plume when worn by a commander, and a sword. Knights Grand Cross wear the largest cross suspended from the right, and the badge on the left side of the Breast; Commanders wear a smaller cross around the neck, and Knights wear a still smaller cross on the left breast of the tunic.—C.E.

Saint Teresa, College of, Winona, Minn.; founded, 1910; conducted by the Sisters of St. Francis, of Rochester, Minn.; college of arts and sciences; summer school; professors, 48; students, 402; degrees conferred in 1929, 39.

Saint Thomas, College of, St. Paul, Minn., founded 1885; conducted by the priests of the Congregation of the Holy Cross; preparatory school, known as St. Thomas Military Academy; schools of arts and sciences, commerce, education, and law; graduate and summer schools; professors, 35; students, 635; degrees conferred in 1929, 73.

Saint Thomas Christians, a body of Christians in India who claim spiritual descent from the Apostle St. Thomas, Bishop of Mylapore, who was martyred 68 A.D., according to strong local tradition and collateral evidence. Various witnesses have recorded that from earliest times a body of Christians dwelt in India and its environs, and, though St. Thomas is for the first time mentioned in documents c. 550, it is highly probable that he was their spiritual father. Little is known of their first prelates; John the Persian called himself bishop of all churches in Persia and Great India at the Council of Nice, 325, but there is no evidence that he ever visited India.

Up to 496 it is certain that all the bishops were Catholic; from then the prelates came from Babylon, but for a long time the Thomas Christians were deprived of bishops, and when finally that patriarchate sent them priests and prelates, these must have been Nestorians, whom the people, in their anxiety for a hierarchy, unquestionably accepted, doubtless unaware that the Nestorian heresy existed. When the Pope in 1423 sent a prelate from Constantinople, they considered the St. Thomas Christians Nestorians (despite protestations to the contrary not voiced until three centuries later), and, laboring to reclaim them, a Synod was held, 1599, at Dampier (Udiamparur), where St. Thomas priests and laymen promised submission to Rome. But in 1653, schism once more tore them away, only 400 of 200,000 remaining faithful. These were for the most part retrieved by the Carmelites sent from Rome, 1657, for that purpose.

Saint Thomas of Mylapur, Diocese of, India; comprises two divisions of land on the Coromandel Coast; erected, 1668; suffragan of Goa. According to tradition St. Thomas was martyred there. Henrique de Silva was bishop of the diocese (1577-97), succeeded by Antonio Barrossa (1597-99), and Theotonio Ribeiro Vieira da Castro (1889). Churches and chapels, 338; priests, secular, 71; priests, regular, 7; religious women, 115; semi-

Saint Viator College, Bourbonnais, Ill.; founded, 1872; conducted by the Congregation of the Clerks of St. Viator; preparatory school; college of arts and sciences; school of commerce and finance; professors, 16; students, 135; degrees conferred in 1929, 18.

Saint Victor, Abbey of, founded near Paris, 1108, by William of Champeaux. Through the generosity of popes and noblemen it was richly endowed, and became a center of piety and learning. The abbey school, together with those of St. Genevieve and Notre Dame, was the cradle of the University of Paris. The end of the abbey came with the French Revolution. In 1800 the church and other buildings were confiscated, and the library was dispersed. There are still several convents at Bruges, Ypres, and Neuilly, which keep the rule and spirit originally received from the Abbey of St. Victor.—C.E.

Saint Vincent, Island of, dependency of the British Empire, in the British West Indies, administered by a legislative council, partly nominated and partly elected; area, 150.3 sq. m.; pop. 49,751.

Saint Vincent, ISLAND OF, Q.E. 1840; conducted by the Jesuits; preparatory school; college of arts and sciences, commerce, education, law; professors, 30; students, 460; degrees conferred in 1929, 64.

Saint Wilfrid's College (Cotton College), Cotton, Staffordshire, England, originated in Sedgley Park School; opened, 1763, by William Errington at the recommendation of Bishop Challoner, and removed to Cotton Hall, former residence of Fr. Faber and the Wilfridians, 1873. It is a middle-class school conducted by secular priests of the Archdiocese of Birmingham.

Saint Xavier College, Cincinnati, O.; founded, 1840; conducted by the Jesuits; preparatory school; colleges of arts and sciences, commerce, education, law; professors, 30; students, 460; degrees conferred in 1929, 64.

Sala, George Augustus Henry (1828-95), journalist, b. London; d. Brighton. He was a man of versatile gifts; his literary talent attracted the attention of Dickens, and he was a special correspondent of the "Daily Telegraph." Before death he was received into the Church.—C.E.

Salamanca, University of, originated in the Cathedral School of the 12th century. It was established as a royal foundation by King Alfonso IX, c. 1230; confirmed by Pope Alexander IV, 1255; and placed under the direct control of the bishop. The academic titles were given in the cathedral, and, until 1830, in the name of the pope and the king. The salaries of the professors were paid out of a special fund assigned to them by Ferdinand IV and Boniface VIII, 1300. By the laws of 1845 the university was placed under control of the government.—C.E.

Sale, Diocese of, Victoria, Australia; comprises the civil Province of Gippsland; area, 16,350 sq. m.; suffragan of Melbourne. Bishops: James Francis Corbett (1887-1911); Patrick Phelan (1912-25); Richard Ryan, C.M. (1926). Churches, 53; priests, 18; religious women, 91; secondary schools, 4; primary schools, 10; pupils in Catholic schools, 1391; institutions, 1; Catholics, 13,208.

Salem, original name of Jerusalem (q.v.).

Salerno, University of. The physicians of Salerno were regarded as almost infallible in the 9th century, but fuller accounts of its medical school date from the 11th. Opinions differ as to its origin, some maintaining it to be of secular foundation while others declare that it was founded by the Benedictines of Monte Cassino under Abbot Constantine the African. The school enjoyed autonomy, and in 1251 Frederick II ordered that it be the only school of medicine and that no one should practise without the approval of its professors. It flourished during the Spanish and Bourbon dynasties but was suppressed in 1811.—C.E.

Salesians. See Society of St. Francis de Sales.

Salford, Diocese of, England; comprises the Hundreds of Salford and Blackburn in Lancashire; erected, 1850; suffragan of Liverpool. Bishops: William Turner (1851-72); Herbert Vaughan (1872-92); John Bilsborrow (1892-1903); Louis Casartelli (1903-25); Thomas Henshaw (1925); Richard Vaughan (1929-38). Churches and chapels, 197; priests, secular, 304; priests, regular, 92; elementary schools, 143; other schools, 25; institutions, 8; Catholics (est.), 293,400.

Salisbury, or Old Sarum, ancient diocese, founded by transference from Ramsbury, with St. Osmund as first bishop, in 675, the see having originated in the foundation of Dorchester by St. Birinus in 634, and having been located successively at Winchester, Salisbury, and Ramsbury; last Catholic bishop, John Capon (d. 1557). The ordinal of St. Osmund became the basis of the Sarum Rite. The cathedral, completed in 1206, is the first important building in the early English style, and its spire, regarded as the finest in Europe, is among the loftiest in the world.—C.E.

Salmanasar, sál-ma-náz'ār (As., the god Shulmanai, or the leader), name of four Assyrian kings, one of whom deserves special mention. Salmanasar IV (726-722 B.C.), waged war against the King of Israel, Osee, for refusing tribute, and besieged Samaria for three years; but it was his successor Sargon who took the country in 721 (4 Kings, 17).

This marks the end of the Kingdom of Israel and the beginning of the Assyrian captivity.—G.G.

(P. F. D.)

Salmeron, Alphonsus (1515-85), biblical scholar, b. Toledo, Spain; d. Naples. He was one of the first companions of St. Ignatius Loyola in forming the Society of Jesus, and became distinguished as preacher and theologian. With Laiznè he went to the Council of Trent as papal theologian or legatian to Paul III (1546), to Julius III (1551), and to Pius IV (1562), and wielded tremendous influence there. His chief writings are scriptural commentaries.—C.E.

Salome (Heb., peaceful). (1) Daughter of Herod Philip and Herodias, at whose request John the Baptist was beheaded. (2) One of the holy women present at the Crucifixion and at the tomb on the Resurrection morning.—C.E.

Salonica, or Saloniki, ancient Thessalonica, seaport of Greece, in western Macedonia. St. Paul addressed two Epistles (see Thessalonians, Epistles to the) to the community there, which was an important center of early Christianity. The city was taken in 904 by the Saracens, in 1185 by the Sicilian Normans, in 1430 by the Turks, and in 1912 by the Greeks. It has some famous churches and mosques of ancient Christian origin. The Latin Vicariate Apostolic of Thessalonica was erected in 1926, with residence at Salonica.—C.E., XIV, 633.

Salt, Liturgical Use of. It is put into ordinary holy water and Gregorian water (water of consecration), and is also used in the ceremonies of Baptism, a small quantity being placed on the tongue of the person to be baptized, with the words: "Receive the salt of wisdom; may it be to thee a propitiation unto eternal life."—C.E. (J. P. S.)

Salt Lake, Diocese of, Utah, includes all Utah and Eureka. Lander, Lincoln, White Pine, Nye, Elko, and Clark counties in Nevada; area, 137,657 sq. m.; erected, 1891; suffragan of San Francisco. Bishops: Lawrence Scanlan (1891-1915); Joseph S. Glass, C.M. (1915-26); John J. Mitty (1926). Churches, 29; stations, 45; priests, secular, 27; priest, regular, 1; religious women, 115; college, 1; academies, 7; high school, 1; parochial schools, 286; pupils in parochial schools, 852; institutions, 3; Catholics, 15,230.

Salt of the Earth, expression used in a similitude which is given in slightly different forms and under diverse circumstances by three Evangelists (Matt., 5; Mark, 9; Luke, 14). Much of the salt used in Palestine is obtained by evaporation of the Dead Sea waters, not perfectly pure and hence liable to corruption and loss of savor. Once corrupted it is fit only to be thrown out in the street or on the refuse piles within or at the edge of Eastern villages. By their vocation the Apostles and their successors are the salt of the earth, i.e., by their teaching and example they must keep men measuring up to the principles of right living laid down by Christ. In St. Mark this parable is rebuke for their quarrels over precedence; in Sts. Matthew and Luke it is a warning to remain true to their vocation by correspondence to Christ's teaching and grace, which alone will give them the authority and spiritual force necessary to imbue others with the true spirit of Jesus.—Fonek, tr. Leahy, The Parables of the Gospel, N. Y., 1915. (N. G.)

Salutation. (1) Motion of reverence by bowing or lifting the hat when meeting a priest, and when passing a church, because it is the House of God and, as a rule, the sanctuary of the Blessed Sacrament. It is common also in the Liturgy, as when at Mass the priest salutes the congregation with "Dominus vobiscum" (The Lord be with you) or "Ora, frater" (Brethren, pray). (2) Characteristic opening of the Epistles of the Apostles, wishing those addressed "Grace and the peace of God," and also of the letters of popes and bishops. (Ed.)

Salutis aeternae dator, or Giver of Life, Eternal Lord!, hymn for Lauds on 1 Nov., feast of All Saints. It is attributed to Rabanus Maurus (776-856) and has eight translations; the English title given is by E. Caswall.—Britt.

Salutis humanae Sator, or Hail, Thou who Man's Redeemer art, hymn for Vespers from the Ascension to Pentecost; Ambrosian school, 7th or 8th century. There are about 30 translations; the English title given is by T. Potter. The second stanza reads:

What nameless mercy Thee o'ercame,
To bear our load of sin and shame!
For guiltless, Thou Thy life didst give,
That sinful erring man might live.

Salvador, republic in Central America; area, 13,176 sq. m.; est. pop., 1,657,000. Christianity was introduced into this region in the 16th century by missionaries who accompanied the Spanish explorers and conquerors. After its emancipation from Spain in 1821, Salvador joined the Federation of Central America, and in 1839, with the dissolution of the Federation, became an independent republic. The Diocese of San Salvador, first a suffragan see of Santiago of Guatemala; it was raised to metropolitan rank in 1913. Catholicity is the dominant religion; free exercise of all religions is guaranteed. Salvador in 1929 comprised the following ecclesiastical divisions:

Salvation (Lat., salvere, to save), in scriptural language, transference from straitened circumstances and other evils into a state of freedom and security. As sin is the greatest evil, Scripture uses the word mainly in the sense of redemption and liberation from sin and its consequences. In St. Paul's Epistles "salvation" usually denotes deliverance from final wrath, as distinguished from "reconciliation" which denotes liberation from present wrath.—C.E.

Salzburg (Lat. JUVAVUM), city in Austria and former prinicipality of the Holy Roman Empire. Barbarian invasions destroyed the beginning of Christianity in Salzburg, and it was only c. 700 that a see was established by St. Rupert of Worms. The diocese became an archbishopric, c. 798, and this period marks the beginning of the temporal sovereignty of the archbishops who obtained possession of an extensive territory measuring 3821 sq. m. in 1648 and many secular privileges, including the coinage of money. Through Conrad III (12th century) they received the rank of papal legate, and in 1278 were appointed princes of the empire by Rudolph of Hapsburg. The principality was secularized in 1802, made a duchy of the Austrian Empire in 1819, and is now part of the Austrian Republic. Known as the German Rome because of its Italian aspect, Salzburg possesses many old ecclesiastical buildings, including a Renaissance cathedral (1614). The city is now the seat of an archdiocese.

Salzmann, Joseph (1819-74), missionary, b. Münchbach, Austria; d. St. Francis, Wis. He was ordained in 1842 and labored five years in Austria before coming as missionary to America. In Milwaukee he became pastor of St. Mary's, and entered upon a long struggle with German freethinkers. There he founded the St. Francis Seminary, in 1856; the Pio Nono College; the Catholic Normal School of the Holy Family, which was the first Catholic normal school in the United States; and the American branch of the St. Cecilia Society.—C.E.

Samaria, sq.-mā'ri-a (Heb., Somron, from Semer, name of the owner of the hill on which the city was built), city in Ephraim, Palestine, capital of the kingdom of Israel since c. 900 B.C. (3 Kings, 16), and its religious and political center. The use of the name gradually extended to the entire kingdom or, after the Captivity, to the central region of Palestine between Judea and Galilee. In the time of Christ there was great hostility between the Jews and the Samaritans, which explains the episode of the Samaritan Woman (q.v.), and Our Lord's command to His disciples not to enter any of their cities (Matt., 10), and makes all the more noble the deed of the Good Samaritan (q.v.). The Gospel seems to have been preached there first by Philip (Acts, 8). The city was rebuilt by Herod and renamed Sebaste, and is now the Mohammedan village of Sebastiah.—C.E.

Samaritan Woman, a woman of Sichar, a city of Samaria, who was converted by Our Lord at the well of Jacob (John, 4). She had come to draw water from the well for her material needs, but Jesus gradually aroused in her sinful soul a desire for the supernatural waters that spring up into life everlasting.—Fournier, tr. Griffith, Christ the Son of God, N. Y., 1908. (J. M. N.)

Samoa, group of islands in the western Pacific Ocean, of which Tutuila and others are under the dominion of the United States, and Western Samoa belongs to the Dominion of New Zealand. The American islands are administered by a commandant-governor appointed by the President of the United States, and a local assembly; Western Samoa is governed by an administrator and a legislative council; area, American Samoa, 60 sq. m.; pop., 8763; area, Western Samoa, about 1250 sq. m.; pop., 41,660. The first Catholic missionaries, Marists, arrived in Samoa in 1845. Samoa comprises the Vicariate Apostolic of the Marists, and Western Samoa, the Vicariate Apostolic of Navarre. There are 60 churches, 6 secular priests, 22 regular priests, 1 seminary, 6 high schools, 101 primary schools, and a Catholic population of 9430. —C.E.

Samoan Islands, Vicariate Apostolic of, Oceania (American possessions); comprises Tutuila, with its attendant islets of Manua, Rose, etc.; entrusted to the Marist Fathers. Vicar Apostolic: Joseph Darnand (1920), residence at Apia, Upolu Island. Churches, 14; priests, 2; religious women, 8; schools, 19; pupils, 599; Catholics, 1119. —C.E.

Sampson, Richard, Bp. of Chichester and later of Coventry and Lichfield; d. Eccleshall, Staffordshire, England, 1554. He gained Wolsey's favor, held many preferments, and became one of the chief agents in the divorce proceedings of Henry VIII. In 1536 he became schismatical Bp. of Chichester, and was transferred later to Coventry and Lichfield by royal authority without papal confirmation. It is said that he afterwards recanted his denial of papal supremacy.—C.E.

Samson, Judge of Israel (Judges, 13-16). Before his birth an angel predicted that he should be the deliverer of Israel and commanded that his hair should not be cut. He showed his superhuman strength by slaying a lion with his bare hands, by killing a thousand Philistines with the jawbone of an ass, and by carrying off the gates of Gaza. His hair was cut off by Dalila, his paramour, and he fell into the hands of the Philistines, who blinded him. On the feast of the god Dagon he pulled down the pillars of a great edifice and perished in the ruins with the Philistines.—C.E.

Sanctuary. (1) Consecrated place giving protection to those fleeing from justice or persecution. The right of sanctuary was based on the inviolability of sacred things and was originally confined to the church itself, but in the course of time its limits were extended to the surrounding precincts, and sometimes even to a larger area. Usually there was a large ring or knocker on the church door, the holding of which gave the right of asylum. The practise of sanctuary ceased towards the end of the 18th century, though the Church still claims her right in canon 1179 of the code of canon law. (2) The space in the church reserved for the clergy. In Christian antiquity, the stone benches for the clergy were let; in the middle stood the bishop's chair and sometimes even to a larger area. Usually there was a large ring or knocker on the church door, the holding of which gave the right of asylum. The practise of sanctuary ceased towards the end of the 18th century, though the Church still claims her right in canon 1179 of the code of canon law. Sancta Mater, istud agas. See Stabat Mater dolosa.

Sanctifying Grace, the free gift of God establishing the soul in the way of justification and holiness. Its intimate nature is beyond mere human analysis, but judging by its effects, we are justified in regarding it as a physical adornment of the soul, permanent in its essence, incompatible with grievous sin, recreating the soul as a new nature competent to act supernaturally and meritoriously. It is habitual grace regarded under one aspect—the real interior sanctification which enriches the soul and makes it permanently holy in the sight of God.—C.E., VI, 701; Pohle-Preuss, Grace, St., L., 1921.

Sanctus is the system of rewards and punishments attached by the legislator to the observance or violation of a law. A moral sanction has a twofold purpose, one deterrent, influencing through the hope of reward and the fear of punishment, the other, through proper punishments procuring the restoration of violated moral order. Sanctions constitute the necessary guarantee of the obligating character of the moral law. Experience proves their necessity and that the sanctions of this life such as remorse of conscience, sufferings, social and legal penalties, etc., are altogether inadequate to prevent the violation of the moral code. Divine Wisdom and Justice demand a truly adequate sanction. Such complete and final sanction is not to be found in this world of struggle between good and evil, where the forces of evil at times seem victorious, but in the future life with its eternal rewards or happiness and the eternal punishments or misery through which goodness and virtue as well as Divine justice are finally triumphant.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine.

Sanctorum meritis inclyta gaudia, or Sing, O SONS OF THE CHURCH SOUNDING THE MARTYR'S PRAISE!, hymn for Vespers for the Common of many martyrs, out of Paschal Time. Written in the 8th century, its authorship is unknown. Thirteen translations are in existence; English title given is by D. Donahoe.—C.E.; Britf.

Sanchez, Thomar (1550-1610), Jesuit theologian, b. Cordova; d. Granada. Author of an exhaustive treatise on marriage and of works on moral theology, he was unjustly accused of immoral teachings, especially concerning "mental reservation." His life was an example of holiness.—C.E.

As time went on, the semicircular niche could no longer hold the numbers of the higher and lower clergy, and a portion of the middle nave was often enclosed with rails and added to the sanctuary. In later times, however, this necessity was met in another way, by introducing between the cross aisle and the apse a compartment or square, the basilica thus receiving the form of a cross.—C.E. (A.C.E.)

Sanctuary Lamp, the light that is kept burning (usually suspended in the middle of the sanctuary) before the tabernacle in which the Blessed Sacrament is reserved. The custom dates from about the 13th century. According to present ecclesiastical legislation, at least one lamp must burn continually before the tabernacle; several may be used, but their number should be uneven. The sanctuary lamp should be fed with olive-oil or bees-wax; but where olive-oil cannot be obtained, the ordinary may permit the use of other, if possible vegetable, oils. Only in extreme necessity may the ordinary permit the use of an electric light. No special color is prescribed; in English-speaking countries a red lamp is generally used.—Wuest, tr. Mulaney. Sanctus (Lat., holy, saintly, saint), one who practises virtue above the ordinary, who is eminent for good deeds; an attribute of God who is all holy; title of those who have been canonized; a title of the faithful, used by St. Paul (Col., 1); part of the preface of the Mass, repeated three times, in reference to God.—Delehaye, Sanctus, Brussels, 1927.

Sandals, Episcopal, slippers with leather sole and embroidered silk or velvet upper part, worn with the liturgical caltige (silk stockings knitted or cut out of fabric), by the pope, bishops, and certain prelates in pontifical solemn Mass. Sandals of simpler design are worn by members of certain religious orders, instead of shoes.—C.E.

Sander (Sanders), Nicholas (1530-81), b. Charlwood, England; d. Ireland. He fled from the persecution of Elizabeth and became the leader of the English Catholic exiles at Rouen, participating in the controversy with Jewel. By the Rescript of Pius V he was appointed to restore ecclesiastical discipline in England (1567). In 1579 he went to Ireland as papal agent through the connivance of St. Paul (Col., 1), part of the preface of the Mass, repeated three times, in reference to God.—Delehaye, Sanctus, Brussels, 1927.

San Francisco, Archdiocese of, California; established, 1853; comprises San Francisco, San Mateo, San Joaquin, Stanislaus, Sonoma, Alameda, Contra Costa, Lake, Marin, Mendocino, Napa, Solano, and Santa Clara counties; area, 18,656 sq. m.; suffragans: Los Angeles and San Diego, Monterey-Fresno, Sacramento, and Salt Lake. Archbishops: Joseph Sadoc Alemany, O.P. (1853-84); Patrick William Riordan (1884-1914); Edward J. Hanna (1915). Churches, 218; stations and chapels, 86; priests, secular, 323; priests, regular, 209; religious women, 1443; universities, 5; colleges, 8; academies, 27; normal school, 1; parochial schools, 87; pupils in parochial schools, 25,164; institutions, 27; Catholices, (app.), 350,000.

San Francisco, California. In 1776 the noted Franciscan Father Junipero Serra, founder of many of the California missions, ordered the founding of the mission San Francisco de Asis, also known as the Mision Dolores. This mission, destined to become the largest city on the Pacific Coast, was probably comprised of a church, a residence for the priests, a military guard, and houses and workshops for the Indians. Until 1822, when California ceased to be a Spanish colony, the mission prospered, but in 1834 the missions were confiscated by the Mexican authorities, and the village of Yerba Buena was established on the old site of the Mission Dolores. Twelve years later it was seized by a United States warship, and the name was changed to San Francisco, 1847. In 1848, by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, California was ceded to the United States, and in 1853, because of the refusal of Mexico to permit an American bishop to exercise jurisdiction in Lower California, the Mexican territory was detached from the Diocese of San Diego or Monterey, and Upper California was divided into the two dioceses of Monterey and San Francisco. San Francisco thus became the residential see of the United States warship, and the name was changed to San Francisco, 1847. In 1848, by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, California was ceded to the United States, and in 1853, because of the refusal of Mexico to permit an American bishop to exercise jurisdiction in Lower California, the Mexican territory was detached from the Diocese of San Diego or Monterey, and Upper California was divided into the two dioceses of Monterey and San Francisco. San Francisco thus became the residential see of an archbishopric. At this time there were only two churches in the city, the old Mission Dolores for those who spoke Spanish, and St. Francis's, erected in 1849, for those who did not speak Spanish; the new bishop laid the cornerstone of St. Mary's church in 1853, Father Anthony Maraschi, S.J., founded St. Ignatius's College and church in 1855, and shortly afterwards St. Mary's Hospital was founded by the Sisters of Mercy. The efforts of the Catholic Church continued to assist greatly in the building up of San Francisco, and when the earthquake of 1906 and the subsequent fire destroyed many churches, asylums, schools, and hospitals, including the great Jesuit church and College of St. Ignatius, and the Sacred Heart College of the Christian Brothers, the generosity of the Catholic congregations of the United States facilitated immediate rebuilding. Among the noted Catholics who have brought honor to the city of San Francisco are: Peter H. Burnett, who became the first American Governor of California and was later Justice of the Supreme Court of California and president of the Pacific Bank of San Francisco; Charles Warren Stoddard, author and journalist; and Garret W. McEnery, who won international fame by his masterful presentation of the claims of the Catholic Church in California to the Pious Fund before the Tribunal of Arbitration at The Hague, 1902. Father Serra, the virtual founder of the city, is honored with an imposing statue in Golden Gate Park, and in 1884 a legal holiday was proclaimed by the State Legislature in honor of the centennial of his burial day. In San Francisco today there are: 3 Catholic publications, "L'Imparziale," a semi-weekly Italian newspaper, "L'Unione," a weekly Italian newspaper, and "The Monitor," a weekly English newspaper; 43 Catholic churches; 29 parochial schools; 4 missions; 134,598 Catholics.

Sangallo, Giuliano Giamberti da (1445-1516), architect and sculptor, b. Florence; d. there. After working on the Palazzo San Marco in Rome and the fortification of the harbor of Ostia, he received the patronage of the Medici family and erected the church of Madonna delle Carceri at Prato (1485), Villa Poggio at Cajano (1489), and in Florence the hermitage of S. Agostino before, the Gate San Gallo, from which he obtained his surname. From 1503-11 he was architect of St. Peter's.

—ANTONIO DA, THE ELDER (1455-1534), brother of the preceding, b. Florence; d. there. He was engaged by Pope Alexander VI to erect the fortification of the Castel Sant'Angelo and the fort Civita Castellana. He later erected the church of Madonna di San Biagio at Montepulciano, one of the handsomest in Italy, as well as many splendid palaces, and became chief engineer of the fortifications of Florence.

—ANTONIO DA, THE YOUNGER (1485-1546), nephew of the preceding, b. Mugello, Italy; d. Terni. Working for 41 years under the patronage of Leo X, Clement VII, and Paul III, he exhibited extraordinary ability as a builder of churches and palaces, and as a military engineer. He succeeded his master Bramante in the building of St. Peter's, completed the church of Madonna di Loreto, and erected at Borgo the church of S. Spirito. The most notable of his palaces are Palazzo Farnese, Palazzo Sacchetti, and Villa Madama. He filled numerous engineering commissions in various Italian cities and cut the Pozzo di S. Patrizio (St. Patrick's Well) at Orvieto. —C.E.

Sanhedrin (Gr., syn, with; hedra, seat), the supreme council and court of justice among the Jews. Whilst some Jewish Doctors would trace back the Sanhedrin to the council of 70 elders instituted by Moses (Num., 11), the earliest undisputed mention which we possess touching the council of elders of Jerusalem dates from the time of Antiochus the Great (223-187 B.C.); the institution may have evolved gradually from the council of nobles, chiefs, and ancients on which the ruling of the restored community devolved at the time of Nehemiah and Esdras (1 Esd., 5; 6; 10; 2 Esd., 2; 4; 5; 7).

The Sanhedrin consisted of 71 members, president included, appointed probably for life, and the formal installation of new members was accompanied by an imposition of hands. At the height of the Sanhedrin's power, criminal causes, according to the Talmud, were tried before a committee of 23 members presided over by the Ab-Beth-Din (president); two other committees, a quorum of at least 23 members was required; a majority of one vote was sufficient for acquittal, but for conviction a majority of two votes was necessary; a unanimous vote for conviction set the defendant free, the court, by some fiction of law, being by this very fact declared incompetent.

The extent of the Sanhedrin's jurisdiction varied in the course of time. Prior to the reduction of Judea to the status of a Roman province, criminal law was administered by the Sanhedrin and by a number of lesser courts in various towns, the Sanhedrin acting as a court of appeals and having also the function of a trial court in certain cases. After the removal of Archelaus, however, when Judea became one of the provinces ruled by procurators appointed by the emperor, criminal jurisdiction re-sided in these officials alone; the Sanhedrin had police powers permitting the arrest of alleged breakers of the law, and upon it devolved the duty of gathering the evidence and preparing the indictment for the procurator, who alone was qualified to hear the case and pronounce the sentence. This view accounts for all the details of the prosecution of Our Lord as narrated in the Gospels; and is supported by what is known of Roman provincial administration throughout the empire. —C.E.

San Juan, Diocese of, comprises the north-east portion of the Island of Porto Rico, the islands of Culebra and Vieques, and the Virgin Islands; area about 2000 sq. m.; established, 1511, by Pope Julius II; immediately subject to the Holy See. This see, at present vacant, has had 55 occupants since erection; the first bishop, Rt. Rev. Alonso Manso, was the first bishop to come to America, taking possession of the see in 1513. Apostolic Administrator: José Torres Díaz. Churches, 55; chapels and oratories, 11; priests, secular, 35; priests, regular, 60; religious women, 265; academies and boarding schools, 9; parish schools, 15; institutions, 14; Catholics, 600,000.
San Marino, republic within Italy; area, 38 sq. m.; pop., 12,027. Legend attributes the foundation of this republic in the 4th century, to St. Marinus, a stone-cutter, from Dalmatia, who settled on Monte Titano. At the beginning it was a religious community on a steep rock; gradually settlements were made around it, the ground was cultivated, and a government organized.

The clergy are under the pastor of the “Pieve,” the parish church of the cathedral. Franciscans established themselves here 1361, the Poor Clares built a monastery, 1609, and the first Capuchin house dates from the 18th century. The College of Belluzzi is the principal institute of learning in the republic.

San Marino comprises ten parishes, eight in the Diocese of Montefeltro, and two in Rimini. The Code punishes with fine and imprisonment any priest who reads from the pulpit a document from an outsider, or who censures the acts of the Grand Council or the Regency, or who refuses to publish an order of the government. Ecclesiastics are political electors, but are ineligible for civil positions. They receive no government support, but each parish has its own patrimony. Religious institutions, corporations, and parishes are forbidden to sell, purchase, transfer, or exchange, or transfer goods without government authority. Acts of ecclesiastical authority relating to the granting of ecclesiastical goods or the collation of major or minor benefices, and the paying of rents of the benefices, cannot be executed without the consent of the regents on the advice of the State Congress. —C.E.

Sanseverino, Gaetano (1811-65), restorer of the Scholastic philosophy in Italy. After a comparative study of philosophic systems he determined to restore the study of the Schoolmen, especially of Thomas Aquinas, and taught logic and metaphysics in the seminary at Naples and ethics in the university. He became canon of the cathedral and scrittore in the National Library, and founded “La Scienza e la Fede” (1840), a periodical in the interest of Christian philosophy. His principal work, “Philosophia Christiana,” covers logic and psychology.—C.E.

Santa Clara University, Santa Clara, Cal., founded, 1851; conducted by the Jesuits; preparatory school; colleges of arts and sciences, engineering, business administration, law: pre-medical school; professors, 51; students, 475; degrees conferred in 1929, 44.

Santa Fé, Archdiocese of, New Mexico; diocese, 1859; archdiocese, 1875; embraces the State of New Mexico, Doña Ana, Eddy, Grant, Lea, Luna, Otero, and part of Sierra counties excepted; area, 104,168 sq. m.; suffragans: Denver, El Paso, and Tucson. Bishops: J. B. Lamy (1850-85); J. B. Salpointe (1885-94); P. L. Chapelle (1894-97); Peter Bourgade (1899-1908); J. B. Pitaval (1909-18); Albert T. Daeger, O.F.M. (1919). Churches, 380; stations and chapels, 107; priests, secular, 92; priests, regular, 52; religious women, 336; colleges, 2; academies, 10; schools (in most of the country missions, the population being entirely Catholic, there are primary schools with Catholic lay teachers), 35; pupils in all schools, 6118; pupils in public schools taught by sisters, 2957; institutions, 10; Catholics, 143,788 (of whom 8187 are Pueblo Indians).

Sant'Angelo, Castle of (Mausoleum of Hadrian), a huge circular edifice in Rome, 230 ft. in diameter, built by Emperor Hadrian for his tomb, 136, and later converted into a citadel. It is connected with the Vatican quarter by the Bridge of S. Angelo, also the work of Hadrian, and formerly contained the Archive of S. Angelo founded by Sixtus IV, Leo X, and Clement VIII to preserve the most important documents and titles of possession of the Roman Curia. Transferred to the Vatican in 1798, the collection is still kept separate under the name of Archive of the Castle.

Santiago, capital of Chile; founded in 1541 by Pedro de Valdivia who built the fort of Santa Lucía around which the city arose. The city is the seat of the Archdiocese of Santiago, and contains the Romanesque cathedral of the Assumption, a Catholic university, eight workingmen's clubs, and several Catholic societies whose object is to procure cheap and healthful homes for the families of workingmen. Seven parishes have houses of refuge where needy women are gratuitously housed. Confraternities of all the parishes, including those of the Blessed Sacrament, Our Lady of Mount Carmel, the Apostleship of Prayer, the Sacred Heart, the Children of Mary, the Congregation of Mary and St. Aloysius, the Most Holy Rosary, Christian Doctrine, Christian Mothers, and Peterspence. Estimated Cath. pop., 500,000.

Santissima, Giovani Santo Gaetano (1757-1877), astronomer, b. Caprese, Italy; d. Padua. After studying under distinguished teachers at Pisa and Milan he was appointed by the Italian Government assistant director of the observatory at Padua, 1806, and in 1813 made professor of astronomy in the university. In 1814 he became director of the observatory, made it renowned for equipment and thoroughness of work, and acquired fame by planetary researches. Besides numerous dissertations on astronomical and geodetic subjects, he wrote “Elements of Astronomy.”—C.E.

Santo Tomas, University of, Manila, P. I., founded, 1611, by Miguel de Benavides, O.P., confirmed as a pontifical university, 1840; and a royal university, 1688; faculties of theology, law, philosophy, medicine, pharmacy, engineering, education, liberal arts; central preparatory and major seminary; conducted by the Dominicans. Professors, 84; students, 2600.

San Xavier del Bac, mission in the Santa Cruz valley, Arizona, nine m. south of Tucson, founded in 1699 by Father Eusebio Kino, S.J., from the University of Ingolstadt, and later completed by Spanish Franciscans. The church and mission buildings, which are the best examples of Spanish Mission style north of Mexico, were abandoned in 1827, and, until 1866, left to the care of the Papago Indians, who saved them from destruction by the Apaches. They are now used as a mission for the Papago Indians and belong to the diocese of Sonora.

Sapiential Books (Lat., sapientia, wisdom), the books of the Scripture which teach wisdom: Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus. (Ex.)
Sara, (Heb., princess), stepsister and wife of Abraham (Gen., 12; 20). Her original name, Sarai, was changed by God's command (17). She gave birth to Isaac when she was 90 years of age, prevailed upon Abraham to expel Agar and Ismael (21), and died at the age of 127 in Hebron (23), where she was buried in the narrow cave of Machelah.—C.E.

Sarawak, Prefecture Apostolic of, Isle of Borneo; established 1927 by division from the former prefecture of Labuan and North Borneo. Prefect Apostolic: Edmond Dunn, of the Foreign Missionaries of Mill Hill (1927), residence at Kuching.

Sarayacú Mission, chief Franciscan mission of the Ucayali river country in northeastern Peru, established in 1791 by Father Narciso Girbal, his first colonists being some Setobos who were joined later by other tribes. Under Father Plaza a good-sized town was built with separate sections for different tribes, as Pano, Omagua, and Yameo, who used the Pano tongue for intercommunication. The government was patriarchal, through Indian officers under supervision of priests. Withdrawal of government support and establishment of other missions led to its abandonment in 1863, but the town continues to be chief port of the Ucayali with a mixed Spanish and Indian population, using the Quichua language as the medium.—C.E.

Sarbiewski, Mathias Casimir (1595-1649), poet, called the Horace of Poland, b. near Plonsk, Poland; d. Warsaw. He entered the Society of Jesus and was preacher to King Wladislaw, 1635. He excelled in lyrics, especially in patriotic odes and was commissioned by Pope Urban VIII to revise the hymns of the Breviary. Also the author of prose works on literary and religious subjects.—C.E.

Sardina, Council of, one of the many synods held originally to settle the troubles caused by the Arian heresy, probably in 343. Ninety-four Catholic bishops and seventy-six bishops favoring Arianism were present. Failing to reach an agreement, the eastern bishops withdrew and convened at Philippi, where they promulgated a new creed and an encyclical, dating it from Sardica (747). St. Osmund, a Norman Bishop of Salisbury, compiled a Missal, Breviary, and Ritual, incorporating the Anglo-Saxon readings of the Roman Rite into the frame of the pedestal, is now in the Uffizi gallery. He was called to France in 1518 by Francis I. The beautiful "Madonna of the Sack" was painted for the cloister of S. Annunziata, in Florence, 1525. His "Last Supper" in the convent of S. Salvi approaches Leonardo's. Other familiar works are the "St. John Baptist" of the Pitti gallery, "St. Catherine," and "St. Agnes," a fresco in the Pisa cathedral. Great as a colorist and draughtsman, he is called the "Faultless Painter," but is criticized for the monotony of his types.—C.E.

Sarum Rite (Sarum Use), the manner of regulating the details of the Roman Liturgy that obtained in Pre-Reformation times in the south of England and in parts of Scotland and Ireland. Anglo-Saxon Christians knew only the Roman Liturgy, as we learn from the Synod of Clovesho (747). St. Osmund, a Norman Bishop of Salisbury, compiled a Missal, Breviary, and Ritual, revising the Anglo-Saxon readings of the Roman Rite to incorporate certain Norman liturgical traditions. The Sarum Missal has been adopted in the dioceses of Salisbury, where the reformers permitted local customs, and the adoption of the Sarum Service Book did not mean the rejecting of existing ceremonial usages in favor of those in vogue at Salisbury, but only a fitting thereof into the framework outlined in the Sarum Missal, Breviary, and other liturgical manuals. The Sarum Rite, in the main, represents the Roman Rite as carried out in the 11th century, and the reforms of the popes, notably the Franciscan revision in the 13th century, very slowly found their way into the service books of the Church in Britain.—C.E.; Rock, Church of Our Fathers, Lond., 1903. (J. A.)

Satan (Heb., an adversary, enemy), name for the chief demon or devil (1 Par., 5), frequently used as a common noun in the O.T. (3 Kings, 5). The form Satanas is used throughout the N.T. in the Vulgate, while the form Satan occurs in the O.T. only. In Matthew, 16, it is used in the sense of contrariness or opposition. (A. E.)
Satisfaction (Lat., satis, enough; facere, to make). (1) In general, reparation made to another to pay a debt or to atone for an injury. Thus, we say that Christ made satisfaction to God for our sins. (2) In particular, compensation made to God for the debt of temporal punishment. Such a debt of punishment may remain after the sin itself has been forgiven, and that man can make satisfaction for it, is evident from Scripture (2 Kings, 12; Jon., 3), and from Christian tradition. The penance (q.v.) given after sacramental confession is intended principally to make satisfaction for the debt of temporal punishment. All supernaturally good works performed by one in the state of grace possess satisfactory value.—Pohle-Preuss, The Sacraments, III, St. L., 1924. (F. J. C.)

Saturday, named for the Roman god Saturn, day of the week consecrated by the Church for devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mary.

Saturday in White, Saturday in Easter week, so called because of the custom in the early Church of laying aside the baptismal robes worn by those who had been baptized on Easter Eve.

Saturnus, Saint, martyr (3rd century), first Bishop of Toulouse, b. Patras; d. Toulouse. Of noble birth, he went as bishop to Toulouse, during the consulate of Decius and Gratus (250). Soon he had a small church in the town and had made numerous conversions. To reach his church, St. Saturninus had to pass the capitol where there was a temple, and the pagan priests ascribed to his frequent passings the silence of their oracles. For this they seduced him, and on his refusal to sacrifice to the idols, condemned him to be tied by the feet to a bull which dragged him about the town until the rope broke. Two Christian women gathered up his remains and buried them in a ditch. A church called the Tier (bull), was erected where the bull stopped. The saint's body is preserved in the church of St. Sermin (Saturninus), one of the most beautiful in Southern France, Patron of Toulouse. Emblems: bull, cross, miter. Relics in Cathedral of Toulouse. Feast, R. Cal., 29 Nov.—C.E.; Butler.

Saul, first King of Israel. When the people demanded a king he was anointed by the prophet Samuel, but lost the favor of God through disobedience. He received David into his household and later persecuted him in jealousy. After visiting the witch of Endor in order to communicate with Samuel's spirit he was defeated by the Philistines, and took his own life.—C.E.

Sault Sainte Marie, Diocese of, Ontario; established, 1804; comprises the districts of Thunder Bay and Algoma; that part of Nipissing x. and w. of Lake Nipissing, and the Manitoulin and other Islands; suffragan of Kingston. Bishop: David Joseph Scollard (1905). Missions and churches, 106; priests, secular, 46; priests, regular, 31; religious women, 204; college, 1; academies, 2; Catholic schools, 50; public schools with Catholic teachers, 70; Indian schools, 3; Catholics, 65,000 (of whom 5,000 are Indian).

Savannah, Diocese of, embraces the State of Georgia; area, 85,980 sq. m. suffragan of Baltimore. Bishops: Francis X. Garland (1850-54); John Barry (1857-59); Augustin Verot (1861-70); Ignatius Persico (1870-72); W. H. Gross, C.SS.R. (1873-85); Thomas A. Becker (1886-99); Benjamin J. Keiley (1900-22); Michael J. Keyes (1922). Churches, 26; stations and chapels, 67; priests secular, 28; priests, regular, 32; religious women, 228; academies, 5; high schools, 4; parochial schools, 15; pupils in parochial schools, 5783; institutions, 7; Catholics, 18,820.

Saviour, a title of Our Lord, arising from the fact that He sacrificed His life to atone for the sins of men and to win for sinful men grace and access to God. Only in virtue of His satisfaction for men's offenses can we obtain salvation: "Neither is there salvation in any other. For there is no other name under heaven given to men, whereby we must be saved" (Acts, 4).

Savonarola, Girolamo (1452-98), Dominican preacher and reformationist. Elected prior to San Marco in 1491, he preached sermons denouncing laxity of morals and gained great influence. Opposing the Medici, he welcomed Charles VIII of France, 1494, and favored the establishment of a democratic republic. He introduced many severe measures to reform morals, came into conflict with Pope Alexander VI, was interdicted from preaching and, refusing obedience, was excommunicated (1497), tried, condemned, and executed (1498).—C.E.; Lucas, Fra Girolamo Savonarola, Lond., 1906.

Saxo Grammaticus (b. c. 1150), Danish historian, author of "Gesta Danorum," a complete history of Denmark to the year 1187, written in ornate Latin at the suggestion of Archbishop Absalon of Lund (d. 1201). The first nine books preserve ancient legendary material, the last seven are historical and based on oral reports.—C.E.

Scala Santa (It., Holy Stairs), twenty-eight white marble steps at Rome, near the Lateran; according to tradition, the staircase formerly leading to the praetorium of Pilate at Jerusalem, hence sanctified by the footsteps of Our Lord during His Passion. They are supposed to have been brought from Jerusalem to Rome by St. Helena, c. 326. In the Middle Ages they were known as Scala Piti, Stairs of Pilate. When the old papal palace was destroyed, 1589, and the new one erected, the Holy Stairs were transferred to their present site before the Sancta Sanctorum. Here they are flanked by four other stairs, two on each side, for common use, since the Holy Stairs may only be ascended on the knees, a devotion popular among pilgrims and the Roman faithful. Pius X granted a plenary indulgence to be gained as often as the stairs are devoutly ascended, after confession and communion. Initiations of the Scala Santa have been built elsewhere and indulgences are attached to them.—C.E.

Scandal (L.L., scandalum, stumbling-block), any word or action which has at least the appearance of evil, and which is the occasion of sin to another. It is a grave sin in grave matter because it is opposed to the law of charity. Christ speaks of scandal: "Woe to the world because of scandals. For it must needs be that scandals come: but nevertheless woe to that man by whom the scandal cometh" (Matt., 18).—C.E. (II A. 8.)

Scandinavian Evangelical Bodies, a movement in the United States to break away from the State Churches in Sweden, Norway, and Denmark. Three bodies have been organized: Swedish Evangelical Mission Covenant; Swedish Evangelical Free Church; and the Norwegian-Danish Evangelical Free Church Association of North America. In doctrine the Covenant is strictly evangelical, accepting the Bible as the inspired Word of God unto men, the only infallible guide in matters of faith, doctrine, and practise, and His message regarding both this life and the life that is to come. The churches are congregational in government. In 1926 in the United States there were 583 ministers, 565 churches, and 48,785 communicants.

Scapulogot, the one of the two buck goats presented before the Lord on the Day of Atonement, chosen by lot to be the emissary goat, not sacrificed for sin, as his companion, but let go into the wilderness, symbolic of carrying the iniquities of the Chosen People into an uninhabited land; or, as some interpret the emissary goat to mean the evil spirit, symbolic of turning back on the evil spirit the sins which he instigated (Lev., 8).

Scapular (Lat., scapula, shoulder-blade), a sacramental worn as a badge of a religious confraternity. It consists of two pieces of cloth, one of which is worn on the breast and the other on the back, with bands or strings passing over the shoulders. A scapular gives its wearer a share in the merits and spiritual benefits of the association of which it is the badge. In certain religious orders an outer garment called a scapular is worn; it consists of a longer piece of cloth hanging from the shoulders before and behind, almost to the ground. In the Middle Ages, lay persons were often permitted to become "oblates" of these orders, that is, they assisted frequently at the monastic services and had a share in the merits of the order; they were allowed to wear the scapular, which, after a time, was made smaller and was worn under the clothing. Certain associations of the laity are known as Third Orders, and the members wear the large scapular (about 5 by 2½ inches); other societies wear the small scapular (about 2½ by 2 inches). The rules concerning scapulars are: the investing must be done by an authorized person; the scapular may be given in any place, to any Catholic, even to an infant; it must be worn as described above; if replaced, no blessing is required; if it is laid aside for a considerable time, the benefits are forfeited during that time. The Church has approved 18 kinds of scapulars.

Scapular of the Hearts of Jesus and Mary, a white scapular with the two Hearts and the implemenets of the Passion on one part, and a red cross on the other. It owes its origin to the Daughters of the Sacred Heart, a community founded at Antwerp in 1873. It was approved in 1900; indulged by Leo XIII and Pius X.

Scapular of the Holy Face, made of white cloth, with the picture of the Face of Our Lord made famous through the tradition of Veronica's Veil. It is the badge of the Archconfraternity of the Holy Face, but the members, instead, may use a medal or cross bearing the same emblem. It is not indulgenced.

Scapular of the Immaculate Conception, a blue scapular, bearing on one part a picture of the Immaculate Conception, and on the other the name of Mary. It was established by the Blessed Ursula Benincasa, foundress of the Theatine Nuns.

Scapular of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, badge of the society of the Sons of the Immaculate Heart of Mary. It is white, with a picture of the Heart of Mary surrounded by flames, surmounted by a lily, encircled with roses, and pierced by a sword.

Scapular of the Mother of God Counsel, a recent scapular, approved by Leo XIII, 1893. Its use is promoted by the Augustinian Fathers. It is white, with one part bearing a picture of the Mother of Good Counsel, and the other, the papal crown and keys.

Scapular of Mount Carmel, the best-known of the scapulars; badge of the Confraternity of Our Lady of Mount Carmel. It is brown in color, and often ornamented with pictures, which, however, are not essential. It owes its origin to St. Simon Stock, an English Carmelite. Originally the investing in this scapular was restricted to the Carmelite Order, but now any priest having ordinary faculties in a diocese can invest in it. The formula now in use was prescribed by Leo XIII, 1888.

Scapular of Our Lady of Ransom, badge of a confraternity affiliated to the Order of Our Lady of Mercy. It is white, and bears a picture of Our Lady of Ransom.

Scapular of the Passion (Red). This and its bands are of red woolen material; on one half is a picture of Our Crucified Lord with the implements of His Passion and the words "Holy Passion of Jesus Christ, Save Us." It owes its origin to a vision said to have been vouchsafed to a Sister of Charity, 1846. Its use is promoted by the Priests of the Mission; indulgences were granted to its wearers by Pius IX, 1847.
SCAPULAR

SCAPULAR OF THE PASSION (BLACK), badge of a confraternity associated with the Passionist Fathers. It bears on the front half the words “Jesu XPI Passio sit semper in cordibus nostris” (May the Passion of Jesus Christ be always in our hearts).

SCAPULAR OF THE PRECIOUS BLOOD, badge of the Confraternity of the Precious Blood. It is red, and one part usually bears a picture of a chalice adored by angels.

SCAPULAR OF THE SACRED HEART OF JESUS, besides the well-known badge of the Sacred Heart, there is a scapular, approved and indulged by Leo XIII, 1900. It is white, bearing pictures of the Heart of Jesus and the Heart of Mary.

SCAPULAR OF ST. BENEDET, badge of a confraternity founded in England, 1865, to give its members a share in the works of the Benedictine Order. It is black and usually bears a picture of St. Benedict; indulged by Leo XIII, 1883.

SCAPULAR OF ST. DOMINIC, fostered by the Dominican Order; the general of that society, however, can give to other priests the faculty of blessing it. It was approved, 1903, by Pius X, who granted an indulgence of 100 days to the wearers, every time that they devoutly kiss it. It is bright and usually bears a picture of St. Dominie on one part and that of Blessed Reginald on the other.

SCAPULAR OF ST. JOSEPH, promoted by the Capuchin Fathers, and used locally since 1880; approved, 1898. It is violet, with white bands; on each half is a square of gold cloth; that on the front part bearing a picture of St. Joseph, with the words “St. Joseph, Patron of the Church, Pray for us”; that on the other part bearing the papal crown and keys, with the words “Spiritus Domini Ductor Ejus” (The Spirit of the Lord is His Guide).

SCAPULAR OF ST. MICHAEL THE ARCHANGEL, the only scapular not oblong in shape. Designed as a square, one part is blue, the other black, and the connecting bands are blue and black. Each part bears a picture of St. Michael slaying the dragon, and the inscription, “Quis ut Deus?” (Who is like to God?). It is the badge of an Archconfraternity of St. Michael, founded, 1878, and indulged by Leo XIII.

SCAPULAR OF THE SEVEN DOLORS, the badge of a confraternity established by the Servites of Mary. It is black, and often bears a picture of the Mother of Sorrows.

SCAPULAR OF THE MOST BLESSED TRINITY, a white scapular with a red and blue cross; badge of the Confraternity of the Most Blessed Trinity, said to have originated in a vision vouchsafed to Pope Innocent II, 1198, in which an angel garbed in these colors appeared to him and directed him to approve the Order of the Most Blessed Trinity for the redemption of captives.—C.E.; Sullivan, Externals of the Catholic Church, N. Y., 1918. (J. F. S.)

SCAPULAR MEDAL, a blessed medal worn instead of one or more of the small scapulars, authorized as a substitute by decree of Pius X, 1910. It bears on one side, a representation of the Sacred Heart, and on the other an image of the Blessed Virgin. It takes the place of any small scapulars in which the wearer has been invested, but not of any large scapular. Investing in any scapular cannot be done with the medal; a scapular must be used. When replaced by a new one, the latter must be blessed. If the medal is used in place of more than one scapular, a blessing is given for each. The priest who blesses must have faculties to invest in the corresponding scapular. The medal may be worn or carried in any manner.—Sullivan, Externals of the Catholic Church, N. Y., 1918. (J. F. S.)

SCErramelli, GIOVANNI BATTISTA (1687-1752), composer, b. Rome; d. Macerata. Author of the “Directoirum Ascesticurn,” a method of spiritual direction, and other ascetical and mystical writings.—C. E.

Scarlatti, ALESSANDRO (1659-1725), composer, b. Sicily; d. Naples. He created the 18th century classical style in music, influencing, outside of Italy, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven. He was concerned chiefly with concerted instrumental music and he is the creator of classical lyric drama. In addition to some 60 operas, his chamber music, of which over 500 cantatas, 10 masses, besides motets and oratorios, are extant, is of a high intellectual order. A member of the Arcadian Academy, he held also positions of choir master at Naples and Rome and as a teacher produced many celebrated musicians.

Domenico (1655-1757), musician, son of preceding, was a skilled performer on the harpsichord and composed many short pieces for that instrument, influencing by his technic such modern masters as Mendelssohn and Liszt. He was choir master at St. Peter's, Rome (1715-19). Domenico's son, Giuseppe (d. 1771), won distinction as an operatic composer.—C. E.

Scavenger's Daughter, the instrument of torture used in England during the reign of some of the Tudor monarchs. It was invented by Sir W. Skevington, lieutenant of the Tower, in the reign of Henry VIII. Its action was the opposite to that of the rack; it compressed the body of the tortured so that blood sometimes exuded. Frs. Luke Kirby and Thomas Cottam, S.J., suffered torture by this cruel machine. (M. P. H.)

Scepticism (Gr., skeptomai, consider, examine carefully), the doctrine that the real truth of things cannot be known with certainty. This conclusion is reached in two ways: (1) by casting doubt on the existence of the thinking subject and of all subjective states and operations (Subjective Scepticism); (2) by calling into doubt the objectivity of the universe and of truth. Universal Scepticism comprises both the subjective and the objective. Contradictory theories, elaborated by philosophers to explain the physical universe, gave rise to Scepticism. Heraclitus taught that nothing exists but bodies in a state of perpetual motion; everything is becoming, Parmenides, that change or becoming is impossible; there can only be one being; the senses are unreliable when they assure us of the plurality of being and the existence of change. In this belief Heraclitus concurred. Subsequent philosophers denied the possibility of knowing reality (Sophists and Sceptics). The Pyrrhonists and the Academicists held that nothing can be known with certainty; that the wise man will suspend judgment, affirming nothing and denying nothing; that we can know appearances, but not reality. Socrates said: "I know only one thing, that I know nothing." More recent sceptics are: Theodore Jouvroy (1796-1842) who asserted that "Scepticism is the final pronounce- ment of the human mind"; David Hume (1711-76), who makes all forms of synthesis and relation subjective in origin; Berkeley, to whom the corporeal world is a mere phenomenon of consciousness, the only objects, distinct from the mind, being spiritual substances (God, the soul, angels); in general the Idealists for whom esse est percipi (to be is to be perceived). Sound philosophy, under the leadership of Aristotle and St. Thomas, teaches: (1) that the senses and the intellect normally are infallible with regard to their proper object; (2) that the ultimate criterion of truth is objective evidence; (3) that Scepticism is impossible in fact, because every man is conscious of certain truths, e.g., his own existence and the principle of contradiction; (4) that Scepticism is self-contradictory as a system or doctrine, expressing implicit belief in the sceptic's own existence, in the principle of contradiction, and in the distinction between knowledge and ignorance, certainty and uncertainty.—C.E.; Belfour, Defence of Philosophic Doubt, Lond., 1901; Turner, History of Philosophy, N. Y., 1908.

Schall von Bell, Johann Adam (1591-1668), Jesuit missionary to China; b. Cologne; d. Peking. He labored first in Shen-si, and later was summoned to Peking to reform the Chinese Calendar. The Emperor Shun-chi appointed him president of the Board of Mathematics and raised him to the rank of mandarin. During the reign of Shun-chi Christianity was tolerated. In 1664 Fr. Schall was thrown into prison and narrowly escaped death.—C.E.

Scheiner, Christopher (1575-1650), Jesuit astronomer, b. near Mindelheim, Swabia; d. Neisse, Silesia. While engaged in research at Ingolstadt he discovered the existence of sun-spots. Prior discovery was claimed by Galileo, but Scheiner was the first to make continuous observations of scientific value. In 1616 the Archduke Maxilian invited him to Innsbruck; here he made important studies in optics. He was the author of "Rosa Ursina," a standard treatise on solar phenomena.—C.E.

Schism (Gr., schizo, divide), the rupture of ecclesiastical union, or the act by which one of the faithful severs the ties which make him a member of the Church, and the breach of ecclesiastical unity, or the state of dissociation or separation which is the result of that act. The hierarchical unity of the Church was taught by Christ and His Apostles and was maintained by the early Fathers. The great champion of ecclesiastical unity was St. Cyprian who conceived this unity as reposing on the effective authority of the bishops, their mutual union, and the pre-eminence of the Roman pontiff. Schisms have disturbed the Church in every age. The Ebionites in the 1st century, the schisms of Novatian, Donatus, Aquilea, the Eastern and Western Schisms, Jansenism, the German Catholics, the Old Catholics, are a few of the principal breaches. Schism is generally divided into two kinds: heretical or mixed, which has its source in heresy or is joined with it; and schism pure and simple, which is merely the rupture of the bond of subordination. The many attempts to legitimize schism have met with disfavor. Some have claimed that they cannot ally themselves with abuses in the Church, others have pleaded the division of the Articles of the Creed into fundamental and nonfundamental, and still others have advanced the theory that the individual should abide by Scripture alone. None of these views can be permitted, however, for theologians have always maintained that unity cannot be preserved save through absolute obedience to the authority of the Church as vested in the hierarchy. Schism is a most serious sin, punishable by excommunication incurred ipso facto, by loss of ordinary jurisdiction, and incapacity to receive any ecclesiastical dignities. Moreover, the faithful are strictly forbidden to receive the Sacraments from Schismatic ministers or to assist at any services in their temples.—C.E.

Schism, Western. The cause of the so-called Western Schism was the temporary residence of the popes at Avignon, France, which began in 1309 under Clement V. This exile from the Eternal City met with opposition, especially in Italy where the people clamored for the return of the sovereign pontiff. Finally in 1370 Gregory XI reestablished his see in Rome, and on his death, 1378, the future residence of the vicars of Christ was the main issue in the subsequent conclave. The cardinals meeting in the Holy City duly elected Urban VI, an Italian. General dissatisfaction, especially on the part of the French members of the Sacred College, and disagreement concerning the validity of the choice led to a second conclave at Fondi (20 Sept.) and the election of another pope, a Frenchman, as Clement VII, who immediately took up his residence in Avignon. As both claimed to be legitimate successors, the Western Church quickly divided, each supporting one or the other. There was really no schism, for the majority of the people desired unity under one head and intended no revolt against papal authority. Everywhere the faithful faced the anxious problem: where is the true pope? Even saints and theologians were divided on the question. Unfortunately, led by politics and human desires, the papal claimants launched excommunications against each other, and deposed secular rulers who in turn forbade their subjects to submit to them. This misunderstanding lasted forty years (1378-1417). An attempt to mend the breach at the Council of Pisa (1409) produced a third claimant and the schism was not terminated until the Council of Constance (1414-18), which deposed the Pisan, John XXIII, received the abdication of the Roman, Gregory XII, dismissed the Avignon Benedict XIII, and finally elected an undisputed pope, Martin V (11 Nov., 1417). The list of Roman, Avignon, and Pisan popes is as follows: At Rome (1) Urban VI (1378-89), (2) Boniface IX (1389-1404), (3) Innocent VII (1404-06), (4) Gregory XII (1406-15); at Avignon, (1) Clement VII (1378-94), (2) Benedict XIII (1394-1417); so-called popes of Pisa (1) Alexander V (1409-10), (2) John XXIII (1410-15).—C.E.; Pastor.

Schlegel, Friedrich von (1772-1829), writer and critic, b. Hanover, Germany; d. Dresden. Educated at the University of Gottingen, he became a Catholic, 1808, and was appointed secretary in the chancellery at Vienna where he vigorously opposed Napoleon and delivered his famous lectures on modern history. His importance lies in his work as a literary critic, and as founder with his brother, August Wilhelm, of the Romantic school. He was the author of a "History of Ancient and Modern Literature," "Philosophy of History," "Lectures on Modern History," and "Esthetic and Miscellaneous Works."—C.E.

Schleyer, John Martin (1831-1912), inventor of Volapük, b. Oberland, Switzerland; d. Constance, Germany. Educated at the University of Freiburg, he was ordained in 1856 and appointed to a parish in Constance. In 1879 he introduced Volapük, an international language based on the Romance and Germanic languages. The Philological Society of London urged its use, and Father Schleyer taught it in Paris, 1886-87. It aroused considerable interest for ten years but passed into obscurity about 1890.

Schmid, Christoph von (1768-1854), author and educator, b. Dinkelsbuehl, Bavaria; d. Augsburg. Ordained priest, 1791, he taught school and in 1826 was appointed canon of Augsburg Cathedral. He was a pioneer writer of books for children and his stories have been translated into 24 languages. He ranks with celebrated modern educators.—C.E.

Schola Cantorum, a place for the teaching and practice of ecclesiastical chant, or a body of singers banded together for the purpose of rendering the music in church. Pope Hilary (d. 408) probably inaugurated the first schola cantorum, but it was Gregory the Great who established the school on a firm basis and endowed it. This Roman school furnished the choir at most of the papal functions and was governed by a prior schola cantorum, or cantor. From Rome the institution spread to other parts of the Church. In monasteries at the present day the name schola cantorum is often applied to certain selected monks who chant the more elaborate portions of the liturgical music. The official in charge of such a schola is usually called the prior.—C.E.

Scholastica (Lat., scholarly), Saint, virgin. Sister to St. Benedict of Nursia. Dedicated to God as an infant, she is said to have lived in a cell near Subiaco. St. Benedict visited her on several occasions for spiritual conferences. Relics at Fleury, Le Mans, and Juvigny. Feast, R. Cal., 10 Feb.—Butler.

Scholasticism, a term generally applied to the currents of thought prevalent among the Christian philosophers and theologians of Western Europe, from the 9th to the 15th century. It does not usually include Byzantine, Arabian, and Jewish thought of the same period. The word Scholastic was inherited from ancient Greece and Rome and in the Middle Ages was used to designate anyone belonging to the schools, i.e., the masters or teachers of the schools. In time these teachers and writers developed a characteristic method of investigation and exposition, known as the Scholastic Method, which they applied both in philosophy and theology. It has ever remained one of the distinctive traits of Scholasticism. Another one of its distinguishing features is the close relation between philosophy and religion manifested in its literary products. Moreover, Scholasticism was notably dependent on ancient philosophy at first on Neo-Platonism and later on Aristotle, as well as on the Fathers of the Church, particularly Augustine. Thus understood it extends from Eriugena to Occam. However, the most typical Scholasticism is that of the 13th century when it attained its highest development and was represented by such thinkers as Albertus Magnus, Bonaventura, Thomas Aquinas, and Duns Scotus. This is Scholasticism par excellence.—C.E.; De Wulf, Scholasticism Old and New, Dub., 1910; Turner, History of Philosophy, N. Y., 1903; Taylor, The Medieval Mind, Lond., 1911. (J. J. R.)

Scholastics (Gr., schole, school), an ecclesiastical attached to, but generally not a member of, a cathedral or collegiate chapter, to whom the administration of its schools was entrusted; name for Jesuits making studies prior to ordination.
Schoolmen, a term commonly used in English to designate the medieval Scholastics. It really has no equivalent but Scholastic in the other more important modern languages. It is ordinarily applied to writers on theology and philosophy who taught in the schools and universities of Western Christendom in the Middle Ages. The Schoolmen are held to have effected a synthesis of ancient philosophy and Christian revelation. They were well versed in dialectics and metaphysics. They were all quite familiar with the Scholastic Method and manifested a high regard for traditional teaching.—Townsend, The Great Schoolmen of the Middle Ages, Lond., 1881. (J. J. B.)

Schottenkloster (Ger., Scotch monasteries), the monastic foundations of Irish and Scotch missionaries on the European continent, particularly the Scotch Benedictine monasteries in Germany. Säckingen in Baden, founded by St. Fridolin, was the first of which we have record. St. James’s of Ratisbon, where Scotch monks came to settle in 1072, became the mother-house of a number of Schottenkloster of which only Erfurt and Würzburg remained in 1692. These two also were given up on the secularization of monasteries in 1803. St. James’s of Ratisbon gradually dwindled and was suppressed by Pius IX, 1862.—C.E.

Schubert, Franz Peter (1797-1828), composer, b. Vienna; d. there. A pupil of Holzer and Salieri, he gave early promise of genius, his first mass in F being performed in 1814. He composed the "Erl King" at eighteen. "Rosamunde" and the "Mass in E flat" date from 1821-24, his prolific compositions culminated in the "C major Symphony" of 1828.

Science is defined by St. Thomas Aquinas as the knowledge of things from their causes. When science is said to be in conflict with religion, it is well to recall what believing Christians have done for the various practical sciences of today. Articles will be found in their proper alphabetical place on: Astronomy; Botany; Chemistry; Geography; Geology; Mathematics; Medical Science; Natural History; Philosophy; Physics; and Zoology, listing the Catholic and other Christian celebrities in each.

Science and Faith. Faith here signifies supernatural faith; it includes the complexus of revealed truths and the subjective assent given these truths on the authority of God revealing them. Science is similarly taken to mean all natural truths and the intellectual assent given them. Science and faith cannot exist in the same intellect with regard to the same object, because the object of science must be luminously evident while that of faith is not intrinsically evident; hence these two from this point of view are mutually exclusive. A threepoint relation between science and faith may be conceived: (1) of act with act; (2) of habit with habit; (3) of habit with act. The act of science cannot exist with an act of faith in regard to the same object, because the objects of science and faith are essentially opposed, as the luminous to the obscure. The concept of science is contrary to the habit of faith, in regard to the same object, because philosophically they are contrary dispositional of the intellect and destroy each other. There are some theologians, however, who hold the opposite view. The habit of faith is not by its very nature (per se) incompatible with an act of knowledge, provided the act of knowledge does not negate the habit of science. Once the existence of God has been demonstrated by reason, faith, which led the intellect to believe in God antecedently to the demonstration, vanishes, but there remains a firm, supernatural adherence to the truth, which is not faith but an effect of it. The Christian who knows that God exists, knows also that this truth belongs to the deposit of faith and is bound up with the truths of faith.

Science and faith cannot contradict each other as Rationalists assert. Admitting, as one must, that the miracles, prophecies, and wonderful effects of the Christian religion prove sufficiently the truth of Christian Revelation, one is bound also to admit that faith and science cannot contradict each other. Only the false can be contrary to the true. Between a true faith and a true science, accord is necessarily established. When a teacher instructs a pupil, the knowledge of the teacher contains what he instils into the pupil's mind. His music is in itself a complete memoir of his life.—C.E.; Frost, Schubert, Lond., 1881.

Schwarz (Schwartz), Berthold, German friar, said to have been born in Freiburg in the first half of the 13th century. He is commonly admitted to have been the inventor of firearms, but his right to be considered the inventor of gunpowder is doubtful.—C.E.

Science and Faith. Faith here signifies supernatural faith; it includes the complexus of revealed truths and the subjective assent given these truths on the authority of God revealing them. Science is similarly taken to mean all natural truths and the intellectual assent given them. Science and faith cannot exist in the same intellect with regard to the same object, because the object of science must be luminously evident while that of faith is not intrinsically evident; hence these two from this point of view are mutually exclusive. A threepoint relation between science and faith may be conceived: (1) of act with act; (2) of habit with habit; (3) of habit with act. The act of science cannot exist with an act of faith in regard to the same object, because the objects of science and faith are essentially opposed, as the luminous to the obscure. The concept of science is contrary to the habit of faith, in regard to the same object, because philosophically they are contrary dispositional of the intellect and destroy each other. There are some theologians, however, who hold the opposite view. The habit of faith is not by its very nature (per se) incompatible with an act of knowledge, provided the act of knowledge does not negate the habit of science. Once the existence of God has been demonstrated by reason, faith, which led the intellect to believe in God antecedently to the demonstration, vanishes, but there remains a firm, supernatural adherence to the truth, which is not faith but an effect of it. The Christian who knows that God exists, knows also that this truth belongs to the deposit of faith and is bound up with the truths of faith.

Science and faith cannot contradict each other as Rationalists assert. Admitting, as one must, that the miracles, prophecies, and wonderful effects of the Christian religion prove sufficiently the truth of Christian Revelation, one is bound also to admit that faith and science cannot contradict each other. Only the false can be contrary to the true. Between a true faith and a true science, accord is necessarily established. When a teacher instructs a pupil, the knowledge of the teacher contains what he instils into the pupil's mind. His music is in itself a complete memoir of his life.—C.E.; Frost, Schubert, Lond., 1881.

Schwarz (Schwartz), Berthold, German friar, said to have been born in Freiburg in the first half of the 13th century. He is commonly admitted to have been the inventor of firearms, but his right to be considered the inventor of gunpowder is doubtful.—C.E.

Science is defined by St. Thomas Aquinas as the knowledge of things from their causes. When science is said to be in conflict with religion, it is well to recall what believing Christians have done for the various practical sciences of today. Articles will be found in their proper alphabetical place on: Astronomy; Botany; Chemistry; Geography; Geology; Mathematics; Medical Science; Natural History; Philosophy; Physics; and Zoology, listing the Catholic and other Christian celebrities in each.

ligious connection of Scotland with Rome is found in the history of Ninian, who was born in southwestern Scotland c. 360, studied at Rome, was made bishop by Pope Siricius, returned to his own country, c. 402, and founded at Candida Casa, now Whithorn, a monastery and the first stone church in Scotland. At his death, c. 432, St. Palladius took up the work of evangelization. In the 6th century Irish missionaries came to Scotland and preached the faith in the western sections of the country.

The earliest period of Scottish Church history was that of the monasteries, and the first and most notable figure was Columba, apostle of the northern Picts. In 563 he settled in the monastery of Iona which held preeminence over all the monasteries of the Picts. Meanwhile St. Kentigern was laboring among the British of the south. He founded the Church of Cumbria and was consecrated first bp. of Glasgow. The first apostle in the east was St. Cuthbert, who entered the monastery of Melrose in 650 and became bishop of Lindisfarne in 684. At the close of the monastic era and the disappearance of the Columban monks, there arose several communities of anchorite-clerics who, with the secular clergy devoted themselves to missionary work. The reigns of Malcolm III and his queen, St. Margaret, during which the Church of Scotland was brought into unity with the rest of Catholic Christendom, saw the restoration of the monastery of Iona, the building of numerous churches, and the spread of the faith into the islands north and west of Scotland. Malcolm's son, Alexander, erected the sees of Moray and Dunkeld, introduced regular religious orders, and founded monasteries of canons regular. His successor, David, brought Benedictine monks from France to Selkirk and Augustinian canons to Jedburgh, secured the restoration of the ancient see of Glasgow, erected five other bishoprics, and established several abbeys, monasteries, convents, and houses for the military orders. At this time also came the complete diocesan reorganization of the Church and the erection of cathedral chapters and rural deaneries, and the modeling of the Divine service on that of the English Church. Two Church councils were held, both presided over by cardinal legates from Rome; and in 1150 the first diocesan synod of Scotland and convened at St. Andrews. Two Church councils were held, both presided over by cardinal legates from Rome; and in 1150 the first diocesan synod of Scotland and convened at St. Andrews. The Scottish Church was menaced by the claim of the English archbishop of York to jurisdiction over her and by the English king's efforts to subject her to the Church of England. In 1188, Pope Clement III announced by Bull that the Scottish Church with its nine dioceses was immediately subject to the Holy See. A council of Scottish bishops met in 1225, the first without a legate from Rome, and elected a conservator to preside over the assembly with quasi-metropolitan authority.

The 13th century was a time of peace and progress for the Church, when many new religious foundations were made. Among the outstanding figures of the 14th century were the bishops Fraser, Lambertson, and David of Moray, the last founder of the historic Scots College in Paris. The year 1342 marks the building of the first collegiate church in Scotland. Lollardism, which grew up during the rule of James I (of Scotland), was condemned in a special act of the Scottish Parliament, and all the graduates of the University of St. Andrews were required to take an oath against it. Lutheranism appeared in Scotland about 1525, and in 1555 John Knox started his crusade against the ancient faith. Churches and monasteries were sacked, Catholics were persecuted, and in 1560 the Protestant Confession of Faith became the state religion. Three later statutes abolished papal jurisdiction in Scotland, repealed all former laws in favor of the Catholic Church, and made it a penal offense punishable by death, either to say or hear Mass. King James VI (I of England), although he promised conciliatory measures towards his Catholic subjects, personally led an attack against the Catholic nobles of the north in 1594, which culminated in the extinction of Catholicity as a political force to be reckoned with in Scotland. However, so great a number held to their beliefs that at the end of the 18th century it was necessary to make provision for what was then a missionary country. The Jesuits labored valiantly; and one holy missionary, John Ogilvie, was put to death for his faith at Glasgow, in 1615. In 1653 Rome incorporated the scattered clergy of Scotland under William Bullantyne, while Jesuits, Benedictines, Francisceans, Vincentians, and Irish missionaries worked together to maintain the position of the Church. Under Charles II the Catholics enjoyed little more indulgence than they had had under Presbyterians, but with the accession of James II the penal laws were suspended, Catholic worship was restored, and the missionaries received government aid. After the Revolution of 1688 conditions again became intolerable for Catholics, and the legislative union of England and Scotland in 1707 made no change. The Emancipation act of 1829, which granted civil and political liberty to Catholics, was preceded and followed by bigotry and persecution, but it made for the extension and development of the Church in Scotland. The hierarchy was reestablished by Pope Leo XIII in 1875, and this act was amicably received throughout the country. Since that time, the number of Catholics, priests, churches, and other religious institutions has more than doubled. Today Catholic schools receive annual grants of money from the government, and religious instruction is sanctioned and provided for in the school system. Catholics enjoy all legal rights and the only office from which they are debarred is that of Lord High Commissioner to the General Assembly of the Established Church, a position which no Catholic would wish to occupy. Scotland in 1929 included the following ecclesiastical divisions. Archdioceses: St. Andrews and Edinburgh, Glasgow. Dioceses: Aberdeen, Argyll and the Isles, Dunkeld, Galloway (qq.v.). Statistics: churches, 349; priests, secular, 514; priests, regular, 75; seminaries, 2; universities and colleges, 3; high schools, 17; primary schools, 240; charitable institutions, 19; Catholics, 600,650. Scot-Hibernian Monasteries, a term which includes the monastic institutions founded during the 6th century in Scotland, through the zeal and energy of St. Columba. They grouped themselves round Iona, which they acknowledged as the mother-house. Traces of Columban foundations are to be found in the northern, eastern and western districts of Scotland, formerly occupied by the northern and southern Picts. Later, Dunkeld took the place of Iona as the head of the Columban churches. Early in the 8th century the remaining Columban monks were expelled by King Nectan, and the primacy of Iona came to an end. The numerous Columban monasteries fell to the Celtic monks who were gradually superseded by the regular monastic orders. Deer Monastery survived the others for 50 years but was extinguished like the rest.—C.E.

Scots College, Rome, founded by Bull of Clement VIII, 1600, for the education of Scottish priests. It was closed, 1708, but reopened, 1829, through the efforts of Paul MacPherson. The students attend the Gregorian University, and are distinguished by their purple cassocks, with crimson sash and black soprana (cape).—C.E.

Scott, Sir Walter (1771-1832), novelist and poet, b. Edinburgh; d. Abbotsford, Roxburghshire. His historical romances had a wide influence in reviving Scottish pride in her glorious past, and restoring her cultural activity long under the blight of Knox and the Reformation. He was a Presbyterian, but loved the noble past, the ages of Faith, and, little as he understood her, his sympathetic attitude towards the Catholic Church, especially in "The Monastery" and "The Abbot," did much to lay the dress of anti-Catholic prejudice, and helped pave the way for Catholic Emancipation. The leaders of the Oxford Movement acknowledged their indebtedness to him. Newman said that Scott turned men's minds in the direction of the Middle Ages, and Keble paid tribute to his genius in influencing men's minds to nobler ideals, and wished he had become the poet of the Church. His short songs and lyrics are among the finest in the language. His translation of the "Dias Iras" is well known. On his deathbed he frequently recited the "Stabat Mater."—Lockhart, Memoirs of the Life of Sir Walter Scott, Edinburgh, 1857-38.

Scourge, a symbol of self-inflicted penance, used in pictures of saints famed for austerities. (J. R. S.)

Scourge of God, Attila, king of the Huns; b. 453. In 441 he successfully led his united Scythian hordes against the Eastern Roman Empire and advanced unchecked through central Europe. Repulsed at Châlons, he entered Italy but was dissuaded from sacking Rome by Leo the Great. His wanton destruction of life and property earned him the title, "Scourge of God." (M. P. H.)

Scout Advisory Council, Catholic, in Great Britain. Its objects are: to assist the Boy Scouts and Girl Guides Association to develop in Catholic circles; to encourage the establishment of Catholic troops and guide companies; to act in an advisory capacity to the bishops, clergy, and lay organizations requiring information as to the organization of kindred movements; to protect the interests of scouts and guides joining open troops and companies and to ensure compliance with the religious policy of both movements; and generally to be responsible to the ecclesiastical authorities for the direction of the movement in Catholic circles. The council is in touch with diocesan organizations in Greater London (including parts of the dioceses of Westminster, Southwark, and Brentwood), Birmingham, Salisbury, and Aberdeen; there are organizing chaplains in the archdioceses of Liverpool and Glasgow, and the dioceses of Brentwood, Hexham and Newcastle, Lancaster, Leeds, Middlesbrough, Northampton, Plymouth, Shrewsbury, and Southwark.

Scranton, Diocese of, Pennsylvania; embraces Luzerne, Lackawanna, Bradford, Susquehanna, Wayne, Tioga, Sullivan, Wyoming, Lycoming, Pike and Monroe counties; area, 8847 sq. m.; suffragan of Philadelphia. Bishops: William O'Hara (1868-99); M. J. Hoban (1899-1926); Thomas C. O'Reilly (1928). Churches, 251; priests, secular, 318; priests, regular, 35; religious women, 1285; colleges, 3; seminaries, 2; academies, 3; high schools, 5; parochial schools, 57; pupils in parochial schools, 24,253; institutions, 10; Catholics, 315,788.

Scribes (Heb., Sopherim, lawyers), in Jewish polity, men of letters, versed in the law of Moses. In the Talmud the scribe was a member of the Pharisees' party, the law of Moses was under their care, and they laid down the law of the God of heaven (1 Esdras, 7)."The scribes as counselors assisted the judges in their official acts. Their social status was eminent; they received great homage from the people. The most celebrated of the scribes were Aillel, Schammai, and Gamaliel, the teachers of St. Paul. The scribes were closely associated with the Pharisees, and served them as their lawyers. They shared the Pharisees' hatred of Christ, and were imbued with a high degree of Pharisaic hypocrisy and venality.—C.E.; Gigot. (A. B. B.)

Scriptorium, a large room in a monastery reserved for the use of the scribes or copyists of the community. When no special room was devoted to this purpose separate cells or studies called "carrels" were made in the cloister, each scribe having a window and a desk to himself. The scriptorium was under the care of the prior, or one of his assistants called the scrinium, who provided all the requisites needed by the scribes, such as ink, parchment, pens. Rules of the scriptorium varied in different monasteries, but artificial light was everywhere forbidden for fear of injury to the manuscripts, and silence was always enforced. Often the scriptorium of a monastery developed some peculiarities of writing which were perpetuated and are of great value in ascertaining the source from which a manuscript comes. — C.E.

Scripture, Sacred, the term which the Christian Church has generally employed from earliest times to denote the collective writings of the Old and New Testaments. The word Scripture, which means writing, is derived from the Latin scriptura, and has graphē and mikros for its Greek and Hebrew equivalents. In the O.T., Scripture is used in the general sense of writing (Ex., 32; 2 Par., 36); though at times it denotes a private (Tob., 8) or public (I Esd., 2; II Esd., 7) written document, a catalogue, or index (Ps. 86), or, finally, portions of the Scripture (Eccles., 14). The Apostles and their disciples called the O.T. simply "the Scripture" (Luke, 4; John, 21), or "the Scriptures" (Matt., 21; Luke, 24; Acts, 17), or, referring to its divine origin "the Holy Scriptures" (Rom., 1), and "the Sacred Letters" (II Tim., 3). These terms, however, were not confined to the O.T. exclusively, for we find that St. Peter extends the designation "Scripture" to the Pauline epistles (II Peter, 3), and that Paul himself seemingly refers by the same expression (I Tim., 5) to both Deuteronomy, 25, 4, and Luke, 10, 7. It was undoubtedly because the Apostles themselves employed these and cognate expressions to designate the writings of the Old and New Testaments that the term "Sacred Scripture" gained so wide a currency in the early Church. — C.E.; Schumacher, Sacraments.

Scruple (Lat., scrupulus, dim. of scrupus, a sharp stone). To scruple, or to have a scruple, is to doubt about and to hesitate doing something on false grounds of conscience. Scruples cause a state of anxiety in those afflicted with them. They arise from excessive servile fear in some persons, because they represent God as an exacting tyrant. In others, they are mere temptations of the enemy of human nature, but frequently fortified by stubbornness and obstinacy in the individual. Scruples are enemies to spiritual progress, because they lead to discouragement and despondency in the practitioner of religion. — C.E.; Slater, Manual of Moral Theology, N.Y., 1908. (E. B. B.)

Sculture. See Art. Christian.

S.D.V. = Society of the Divine World (Verbi).

Sea, Apostleship of the, a society for promoting the spiritual welfare of Catholic seafarers throughout the world, with headquarters in London. Working in cooperation with the twelve sailor centers which existed in 1920, the Apostleship began in that year a crusade which has resulted in the establishing of more than 100 enrolling centers where sailors can add their names to the 18,000 seafarers of all nations who have joined the Apostleship since 1922. Apostleship publicity, broadcast in many languages to the Catholic press throughout the world, has resulted in the formation of national sections in Holland and Spain, regional headquarters in Australia, Canada, India, Italy, New Zealand, and South America. In this effort the Brothers of the St. Vincent de Paul Society have taken a generous part. The coordinating Council of the S.V.P. and Apostleship of the Sea provides a general clearing-house for all Catholic sailor-service activities and apostleship centers, and any help that is at the disposal of all Catholic organizations and of individual Catholics who desire to help sailors. The Apostleship publishes a monthly newspaper in English, with bulletins in Dutch, French, German, Italian, Spanish and other languages.

Sea, Confession at. Any priest making a sea-voyage is empowered to administer the sacrament of Penance provided he has received sacramental jurisdiction from his own Ordinary or from the Ordinary of the port of embarkation or from the Ordinary of any port touched on during the voyage. Such a priest can validly and licitly impart sacramental absolution to his fellow voyagers and to those who for any reason visit the ship at some port; moreover, in case he goes on shore for a brief visit (not more than three days) he can hear the confessions of persons who ask him to do so, and can even absolve from cases reserved to the Ordinary of the place. — P.C. Augustine; Kelly, The Jurisdiction of the Confessor, Wash., 1927. (F. J. C.)

Seal (Lat., sigillum), a design impressed on wax or other plastic material or the same adhering to or attached by cords to a document as evidence of its authenticity. The use of a seal by men of wealth and position was common before the Christian era; through the centuries the practise spread and at the synod of Chalons-sur-Saone, in 813, it was enacted that letters under the bishop’s seal should be given to priests when they lawfully quitted their own diocese; the custom of bishops possessing seals may be assumed to have been rather general from this date. At first the seal was used for securing the document, but later it was attached to its face and served as an authentication; the deed was thus held to be valid as long as the seal remained intact. It soon followed that not only kings and bishops, but every kind of body corporate, cathedral chapters, municipalities, monasteries, etc., used a seal to validate the acts executed in their name. During the early Middle Ages lead seals, or "bulls" were used, but except in the case of the papal chancery, it became the universal practise to take the impressions in wax. The seal necessitated that when authority passed into new hands the old seal should be destroyed and a new one made; when the pope dies it is the first duty of the Cardinal Camerlengo to break up the Fisherman’s Ring, the papal seal. — C.E.

Seal of Confession, the solemn obligation of keeping secret all sins confessed in a sacramental confession and anything else made known by the penitent in connection therewith, the manifestation of which might be obnoxious to him or might render the sacrament of Penance odious. This obligation arises from the natural law, the positive law of Christ, and the law of the Church. It binds the confessor and any other person who may discover what has been told in confession. Under no circumstances is it allowed to reveal the matter of another's confession, unless the penitent freely gives permission. Confessors are enjoined not to speak of what happens in the confessional even in a general manner, even though they do not mention the time, place, or other circumstances connected with it.—C.E.; Codex Juris Canonici, can. 889; P.C. Augustin; Kurtscheid-Marks, The Seal of Confession.

Seat of Wisdom, expression applied to the Mother of God, as throne, source, shrine, sanctuary of wisdom. It is an invocation in the Litany of Loreto.

Seattle, Diocese of, Washington, embraces the counties of Chelan, Clallam, Clarke, Cowitz, Grays Harbor, Island, Jefferson, King, Kitsap, Kittitas, Klickitat, Lewis, Mason, Pacific, Pierce, San Juan, Skagit, Skamania, Snohomish, Thurston, Wahkiakum, Whatcom, and Yakima; area, 36,644 sq. m.; established 1850 as Nesqually, name changed to Seattle, 1907; suffragan of Oregon City. Bishops: A.M.A. Blanchet (1850-79), Aegidius Junger (1879-95), Edward John O'Dea (1896); Churches, 156; priests, secular, 97; priests, regular, 104; religious women, 1010; colleges, 2; parochial schools, 49; children in parochial schools, 10,222; institutions, 21; Catholic, 91,000.

Sebastian, Saint, martyr (c. 288), b. probably Milan; d. Rome. Little more than the fact of his martyrdom can be proved. According to the Acts written in the 5th century and now considered unhistorical, Sebastian, an officer in the imperial body-guard, was pierced with arrows, healed by St. Irene, and finally clubbed to death. Among the famous paintings of the saint are those by Mantegna in the Vienna Gallery; Ribera in the Prado, Madrid; Polliajuolo in the National Gallery, London; and seven by Guido Reni. A famous basilica was erected over his tomb in the Catacomb named for him on the Appian Way, and some of his relics were probably brought to Soissons, 829. Patron of archers and gunsmiths, and of many cities; he is also invoked against pestilence. Emblems: arrows and a crown. Feast, R. Cal., 20 Jan.—C.E.; Butler.

Sebastian Newdigate, Blessed, martyr (1525), d. Tyburn, England. Educated at Cambridge, he later went to court and became a favorite of Henry VIII, to whom he served as privy councilor. After the death of his wife, 1524, he became a monk in the London Charterhouse. Arrested, 1533, for refusing the Oath of Supremacy, he was imprisoned in the Marshalsea where he was subjected to torture. Tried before the council, he was condemned to the Tower, and executed with Thomas Ewem and Humphrey Middlemore. Beatified, 1888.—C.E.

Secchi, An-ge-lo (1818-78), Jesuit astronomer, b. Bergamo, Italy. He came to America in 1848 and was professor at Georgetown University. The next year he became director of the observatory in the Roman College. In astronomy the sun was the chief object of his study. He laid the foundations of the unique "Sun Records," discovered the "flash spectrum," invented new instruments for the study of the fixed stars, and discovered the five Secchi types of stars. In meteorology he was a disciple of Maury, and invented the "Meteorograph." He acquired fame as a physicist by his "Sulla unità delle forze fisiche." After 1870 he remained firm in his allegiance to the pope.—C.E.

Sechelt Indians (properly SICIAITL), a small tribe of Salishan linguistic stock in British Columbia, now gathered upon a reservation of the Fraser River agency. They subsisted on salmon, venison, and berries, lived in communal structures of cedar, and were sun-worshippers. Mission work was begun by the Oblate Fr. Durieu, who rescued them from heathenism and general degradation and gathered them into a new town. They are now a moral and industrious people, numbering about 250, all Catholics.—C.E.

Second Order of St. Dominic, or DOMINICAN SISTERS, an order of women founded at Prouille, France, 1205, by St. Dominic. Many monasteries were established in Europe, a number of which were suppressed during the revolutions which affected Catholic countries from the close of the 18th century. The nuns are strictly cloistered; they recite the Divine Office in choir, engage in manual work, and have achieved various literary and artistic successes. Houses of the order are numerous throughout Europe and total 7 in the United States.

Secret (Lat., secreveru, to set apart), occult knowledge which must not be revealed. It may be a natural secret (1). One sees a respectable person accidentally commit a misdemeanor, by the nature of the fact, cannot reveal it. Promised secrecy is what the word implies. An official secret binds the professional person because of an implicit pact between him and his client. In the tribunal of Penance, the confessor is obliged by the so-called "Sigillum Sacerdotalis," not to divulge anything directly or indirectly under any circumstances. History cites St. John Nepomucene as a martyr to the sacramental secret (1393).—C.E.

Secretariat of State, Papal, an office of the Roman Curia, through which the pope transacts all diplomatic negotiations with secular governments and directs ordinary and extraordinary ecclesiastical affairs. The Secretariat is governed by the Cardinal Secretary of State and is composed of three sections. The first section concerns itself with matters to be submitted to the Congregation for mankind, striving morally to enoble themselves and moral reform. The "Manual of Freemasonry" defines it as "the activity of "activity of Freemasonry" defines it as "the activity of mankind, which they aspire to exhibit even now on a small scale." Freemasonry professes the empiric or positivist geometrical method of reason and deduction in the investigation of truth, is essentially Naturalism, hence opposed to Supernaturalism, and is opposed not only to Catholicism and Christianity, but also to the whole system of supernatural truth.

It systematically promotes religious indifferentism, and its ultimate purpose is "the overthrow of the whole religious, political, and social order based on Christian institutions and the establishment of a new state of things according to its own ideas and based in its principles and laws on pure Naturalism." Although claiming religious toleration as one of its principles it openly.

Since 1738 Catholics are, under penalty of excommunication incurred ipso facto and reserved to the pope, strictly forbidden to enter Masonic societies, or promote them in any way. Odd Fellows, Independent Order of, an international, fraternal, beneficary society with headquarters in the United States; founded in England, 1812, as an outgrowth of rivalry to the Masons, introduced into America, 1819. Its distinctive feature is financial care of sick and distressed members and their families. Pythias, Knights of, a benevolent and charitable society founded in Washington, D.C., 1864, by prominent Freemasons headed by J. H. Rathbone, Sons of Temperance, an order founded in New York in 1842 and introduced into England, 1846, with the object of making permanent the temperance movement of that time. It has life insurance, sick, and funeral benefit features.

A decree of 18 Jan., 1896 allows a nominal membership in the last three, if these conditions are fulfilled: that the society was entered in good faith, that there be no scandal, that grave temporal injury would result from withdrawal, and that there be no danger of perversion.-C.E., XIV, 73.

Secular Clergy (Lat., secularia, pertaining to the world), a term applied to the clergy, who are not members of a religious order, and whose immediate superior is the bishop of the diocese, to whom they owe obedience and under whose direction they labor for the sanctification of souls, and for this purpose are not bound by rule of cloister, but are more freely in touch with persons of the world.—C.E. (w. a. s.)

Secularization, an induit or a grant to a religious to live perpetually outside the cloister. The Holy See alone may give this permission to religious who belong to religious institutes of pontifical right; but the Ordinary of the place is likewise competent for religious of diocesan right. A secularized religious is no longer a member of his institute; he must lay aside the habit of the order or congregation, and as to Mass and canonical hours, the use and administration of the sacraments, he is likened to seculars. He is likewise freed from his vows, without prejudice to the obligations attached to major Orders, if he has received them; he is not obliged to say Divine Office by reason of his profession nor is he bound to the other rules and constitutions. If by Apostolic permission he reenters the institute, he must renew his novitiate and profession, and his place among the professed is according to his new profession. If a secularized religious is in Sacred Orders, and has not lost his diocese by final profession, he is obliged to return to his diocese and his own Ordinary must receive him; if he has lost his diocese, he cannot exercise Sacred Orders outside the Institute until he has found a bishop who is willing to receive him or until the Holy See provides otherwise. A bishop may receive such a religious either absolutely, thereby incurring him into the diocese, or on trial for a period of three years; if the former religious has not been dismissed from the diocese before this time has transpired he is in- cardinated into the diocese. Unless he has received a new and special grant from the Holy See a secularized religious in Sacred Orders may not receive any kind of benefice in major or minor basilicas, or in cathedral churches; he may not teach or hold office in major or minor seminaries or in colleges where clerics are educated or in those universities and institutions which by Apostolic induit may confer degrees; nor may he discharge any office or charge in episcopal courts, or in any religious house be it of men or of women, even though only diocesan. Those who were given a similar grant before the Code may not receive any of the aforementioned offices or charges. These disqualifications affect also all those who took temporary vows, or an oath of perseverance, or have made certain promises according to their constitutions and have been dispensed from them if they have been bound by these various bonds for a period of six years.—C.E.; Papi, Religious in Church Law, N. Y., 1924. (w. a. s.)

Sedella, ANTONIO DE, known as “PÈRE ANTOINE” (1730-1829), rector of St. Louis Cathedral, New Orleans, b. Spain. He became a Capuchin friar, was sent to Louisiana as commissary of the Inquisition in 1779, but was deported by Governor Miro for fear of an uprising. He returned, 1783, as priest of St. Louis Cathedral, where during his long pastorate he became the idol of the French population. The date-palm sheltering the rude hut in which he lived is the subject of stories by Aldrich, Dimitry, and Lafcadio Hearn.

Sedia Gestatoria, portable papal throne, consisting of an ornamented, silk-covered armchair fastened on a suppedaneum (foot-rest), with rings through which rods are passed, by which red-uniformed footmen may carry it; used at the coronation of a new pope and other solemn entries.—C.E.

Sedibus cæli nitidis receptos, or SING, O YE FAITHFUL, SING TWO ATHLETIC BROTHERS, hymn for Vespers on 7 July, Feast of Sts. Cyril and Methodius. It was written by Frs. Leanetti and Salvati probably c. 1880. There are three translations; the English title given is by the Benedictines of Stanbrook.—Britt.

Sedilia (Lat., seats), seats on the south side of the sanctuary for the officiating clergy during the liturgy. The earliest examples came in the catacombs where one stone seat was placed at the side of the altar. The number of seats has since increased to four and five although the usual number is three, the center one for the celebrant, that on the right for the deacon and on the left for the subdeacon. They were formerly covered with canopies and pinacles and in England were often recessed into the thickness of the wall of the church.—C.E.

Seduction, in a special sense, that specific sin against justice and the sixth commandment whereby a person forcefully persuades another of either sex to engage in unlawful sexual intercourse. This sin contains the twofold malice of injustice and impurity. It constitutes a matrimonial impediment, for which, however, certain conditions are required. —C.E.

Sedulius Scotus, called “the Younger,” Irish commentator of the 9th century who taught at Liége. Author of an important ethical treatise “De Rectoribus Christianis” (Christian Rulers) the first “Mirror of Princes,” in which works came to be called. He left a commentary on Porphyry’s “Isagoge,” a scriptural commentary, and interesting letters.—C.E.

See, amid the winter’s snow, hymn written by Rev. E. Caswall.

See, Episcopalian (Lat., sedes, seat), a territory over which a bishop rules or did rule. See and diocese are synonymous words. The creation of new Growth, those who preach the Word of God must patiently wait for the fruit of their labors. The Kingdom of God in each Christian soul in particular. Patience is the great lesson taught by this parable, hence the stress laid on the spontaneity of the growth. Those who preach the Word of God must patiently wait for the fruit of their labors.

There is no liturgical assignment of this parable to any Sunday of the year.—Madame Cecilia, St. Mark, Lond., 1906; Fončk, tr. Leahy, The Parables of the Gospel, N. Y., 1915.

Secerth, Archdiocese of, Kurdistan, Iraq, archiepiscopal see of the Chaldean Rite, united with Rome in the 16th century. Abp. Ibrahim Addai-Cher (appointed 1902) and a number of the villagers were massacred by the Turks, 1917. Churches or chapels, 38; priests, secular, 21; schools, 10; Catholics, 5430.

Of a distinguished family, he left the diplomatic service to enter the priesthood and devoted himself to the poor of Paris. For four years he was auditor of the Rota at Rome; he then lost his eyesight and returned to Paris. The honors of the episcopate were conferred upon him without the title. He founded the St. Francis de Sales Society for the defense of the faith, and the Scholastic and devotional books in a popular style, which had a large circulation in English.—C.E.

Seidl, Johann Gabriel (1804-75), poet, author of the Austrian national hymn, b. Vienna; d. there. He was custodian of the imperial cabinet of medals and antiques at Vienna, censor of books, and in 1848 member of the Chamber of Deputies. His adaptation of the national anthem brought him many honors. The didactic poems, "Flineslein," are his best work.—C.E.

Seismology (Gr., seismos, shaking), a science immediately concerned with every vibratory movement of the earth's crust consequent upon the release of subterranean forces. As to all other sciences, Catholics have contributed liberally to its advancement. dozen or more local quakes. Davison in his “Founders of Seismology” says of Bertelli: “Few men have left behind them such a record of energetic labor and unfailing kindness to those who sought his help.” Luigi Palmieri was another outstanding figure in Italian seismology. At the age of forty he was appointed professor of philosophy at the University of Naples and in 1860 was elected to the chair especially created for him, that of terrestrial physics. He was the first by his electromagnetic seismograph to record earth tremors intelligible to human beings, and to use the term seismograph. The service of Pietro Tacchini (1838-1905) to seismology was administrative rather than direct. Designated in 1887 the director of the R. Ufficio Central di Meteorologia e Geodinamico, he located as many as 67 seismoscopes in the several meteorological stations throughout Italy and founded the fortnightly “Supplemento” on seismology in France is identified with the name of Fernand Jean Baptiste Marie Bernard, Comte de Montessus de Ballore (1851-1923). Detailed to El Salvador in charge of a military mission in 1881, he devoted his leisure hours to the study of the earthquakes of this southern country. One hundred and forty-eight memoirs are counted to his credit, the principal ones touching the geographical distribution of seismicity. In 1906 Ballore was placed in charge of the seismological service of Chile, which position he filled to the time of his death. Over 10% of the present system of seismological observatories, which numbers about 350 units, are maintained by Catholic institutions of learning. Six of these stations are supervised by the Philippine Weather Bureau, two are located in Spain, and one in the following countries: Syria, England, Cuba, Hungary, Australia, Madagascar, Italy, Bolivia, Colombia, and Canada. In 1909 the Jesuit Seismological Service was established in the United States. A chain of 18 stations was placed in the following places: Brooklyn, Buffalo, and Fordham, N. Y.; Cleveland, Ohio; Chicago, Ill.; Denver, Colo.; Georgetown, D. C.; Milwaukee, Wis.; Mobile, Ala.; Spokane, Wash.; St. Mary’s, Kan.; St. Louis, Mo.; and Worcester, Mass. In more recent years several of these stations have been discontinued and others added. Also more sensitive equipment has been substituted for the older type of machines and a new society formed under the title of the Jesuit Seismological Association.

SEMINARIES AND STUDIES

Seminaries and Studies, Congregation of. This congregation was founded by Benedict XV, 4 Nov., 1915, who united to it the Congregation of Studies. The presiding officer is the cardinal prefect who is ex officio a member of the Holy Office and of the Biblical Commission. The cardinal secretary of the Consistorial Congregation is by law a member of this congregation. This congregation

Self-Defense, the use of force by a private individual in protecting his natural rights from unjust aggression. These natural rights are the right of life, of property, of good name. When recourse at the moment of unjust aggression, cannot be had to civil authority, then force from a motive, not of hatred or vengeance, but of self-defense, may be used against the aggressor. The force employed must never be more harmful than is necessary for one’s protection. —C.E.; P.C. Augustine. (v. J. H.)

Semaine, a small congress lasting a week, and devoted to some special branch of learning. It differs from a congress in that it is addressed to students rather than to experts, its object being not so much to publish new discoveries as to stimulate interest, to indicate lines of work, and to promote intercourse between learners and those capable of instructing them. In some respects, it partakes of the nature of a summer-school or institute. The Catholics of France, assisted by M. Henri Lorin, have organized a “semaine sociale,” devoted to the study of Catholic sociology. This brings together a great many priests and lay-people, and the idea has been imitated in Spain and Italy. Meetings are sometimes held in London. In 1911, a “semaine rurale” was organized at Lyons, a “semaine d’apologetique populaire” at Lille, and in 1912 a “semaine d’ethnologie religieuse” at Louvain.”

Semi-Arianism, a name applied to the beliefs of those eastern Christians who in the 4th century were not altogether satisfied with the formula “consubstantial” of the Nicene Council. This party was divided into many factions; of these the nearest to orthodoxy was that led by Basil of Ancyra. For half a century they caused considerable confusion in the Eastern Church. In their explanation of the Trinity they inclined to the view of subordinating the Son to the Father, not always realizing that any real subordination militated against the divinity of the Second Person. Much of the bitterness of the controversy was caused by a personal hostility towards Athanasius for his determined stand against Arius at the Nicene Council (Constantinople, 381) rapidly disappeared. —C.E.

Semidouble Feast, a feast of less importance than a “double” feast. It is so called because the antiphon before each psalm in the Sacred Office is not read in full, and thus is only “half-doubled” for that psalm.

Seleucians, a Gnostic sect said to have flourished in Galatia about the latter half of the 3rd century. Their teaching, based on the crudest form of dualism, held that matter is coeternal with God, that evil is to be attributed to God as well as to matter, that the human soul is formed from earthly elements by angels. They did not practise baptism; by hell they understood the present world; resurrection was explained as merely the procreation of children. They interpreted Ps. 18, 6 as meaning that Christ left His body in the sun. They were the source of other errors by disciples who called themselves Procliniatites or Hermeonites.—C.E. (J. J. L.)
supervises everything pertaining to the government, discipline, administration, and alienation of the temporalties, and the studies of all seminaries which are not subject to the Congregation of Propaganda. It directs the government and studies of all universities and faculties which are under the authorities of the Church, including those directed by religious orders or congregations. It examines and approves new institutions, grants the power to con-erf academic degrees, and prescribes the conditions for granting them. It can itself confer degrees.—
C.E.; XIII, 146.

Seminaries, Ecclesiastical, a school established exclusively for the scholastic and spiritual training of candidates for the diocesan clergy. Each diocese should have its own seminary; when this is impractical, the bishop may either send his students to other diocesan seminaries or join other bishops in establishing, with permission of the Holy See, an interdiocesan, provincial, or even national seminary.
In larger dioceses two seminaries should be established: a minor or preparatory seminary for seconddary and collegiate education, and a major seminary for the courses in philosophy and theology. At least two years are devoted to philosophy and kindred sciences; the theological course consists of four full years in the study of dogmatic and moral theology, Sacred Scripture, church history, canon law, liturgy, homiletics, and ecclesiastical chant; lectures in pastoral theology and practical exercises, especially in catechetical method, administering the Sacraments, attending the sick and the dying, complete the curriculum. For the priestly candidate's own spiritual development and his preparation for the ministry of public cult certain common practises and duties are prescribed: morning and evening prayers, daily meditation and Mass, weekly confession and frequent Communion, assistance at solemn Mass and Vespers on Sundays and feasts, participation in sacred ceremonies, an annual retreat, and at least weekly spiritual conferences.
Outside the regulations of the common law, every seminary has its own rule approved by the bishop; interdiocesan and regional seminaries are governed according to norms formulated by the Holy See.—

Augustine.

Semipelagianism, the doctrines first put for-w ard by Cassian (c. 360-c. 435), Abbot of St. Victor at Marseilles, and which amounted to a compromise between the Augustinian explanation of grace and that held by the Pelagians. According to Cassian and his followers God's grace sometimes awaits man's free cooperation; the beginning of faith is in one's power; salvation, always supposing the assistance of grace, depends finally upon one's own will; there is no such thing as predestination ante pravicia merita; grace is given to all, or when denied is withheld because God foresees one's evil use of it. These opinions became popular in southern Gaul and were defended by Vincent of Lérins and others. Opposed by August-tine, Prosper of Aquitaine, and later by Fulgentius, Bp. of Ruspe, they were formally condemned in the Council of Orange (292). It should not be noted that the term "Semipelagianism" is a 16th century creation, having been first urged as a taunt against the opinions of Molina during that the-ological's controversy with the Dominicans. A proper meaning for the word was discovered in applying it to Cassian and his school.—C.E.

Semites, a group of peoples whose home in Asia and Africa, and who descend from Sem, son of Noe.
In historic times all western Asia, with the exception of Asia Minor, was Semitic, and philologically the race is divided into four chief groups: Babylonian-Assyrian, Chanaanite, Aramaic, and Arabian.
The tribes which inhabited these territories show in their language, traits, and character a sharply-defined individuality which separates them distinctly from other peoples. Their languages are closely related to one another, being dialects of a single linguistic group, the purest form being found in Arabia; and from this and other circumstances it has been concluded that Arabia is the original home of the Semitic race. The Semites have contributed much to civilization, e.g., to Babylonia are traced the beginnings of astronomy and perhaps mathematics, and the division of time by weeks, and to Phenicia the distribution of the alphabet.—

Semmelweis, Ignaz Philipp (1818-65), physician, discoverer of infection as cause of puerperal fever, b. Buda, Hungary; d. Vienna. After being assistant at the obstetrical clinic at Vienna, he became, 1850, head of St. Roch's hospital, Pest, and professor of obstetrics. He died in an insane asylum. After his death he was recognized as the pioneer of antiseptic treatment.—C.E.

Semmes, Raphael (1809-77), naval officer, b. Charles Co., Md.; d. Point Clear, Ala. Having served with distinction in the U. S. Navy, he was appointed commander in the Confederate Navy at the outbreak of the Civil War, and attained the rank of rear-admiral, 1865. As captain of the "Alabama" he made the celebrated cruise which destroyed the Northern merchant marine. His political disabilities were never removed.—C.E.

Sennacherib (As., the Moon God increases the brothers), one of the greatest kings of Assywarrior, and builder (705-681 B.C.), mentioned in the Bible in connection with Eszechias (4 Kings, 18-19; Is., 36-37). He invaded Palestine twice; during his second Invasion, the bulk of his army was miraculously destroyed, the rest fleeing with him. Shortly afterwards he was assassinated (4 Kings, 19).

Sennen, Saint. See ADDON AND SENNEN.

Sense of Sin, a salutary fear produced in us by a clear understanding of the nature and malice of sin. It is a realization that we are in a fallen state, and that without God's grace we cannot overcome temptation, avoid sin, or perform the least supernatural act.

Sentence (Lat., sententia, judgment), in canon law the decision of the court upon any issue brought.
before it. Canon law, as opposed to civil, draws a unique distinction between penalties inflicted later sententia and ferenda sententia, two expressions indicating the manner in which guilt is declared and a penalty contracted. A penalty given later sententia is one attached by law to the mere fact of commission of a crime, or violation of a law or precept. It calls for no intervention of an ecclesiastical judge or superior. On the other hand, a penalty ferenda sententia is one imposed by a judge or superior. The Church resorts to penalties later sententia simply because her field of action embraces the conscience of man as well as his external life. Penalties are never considered to be later sententia unless explicitly expressed in the law. The present legislation restricts the practise of imposing penalties later sententia by first demanding, in many cases, a declaratory sentence. In doubt, punishments are to be presumed to be ferenda sententia.—C.E.; Woywood; P.C. Augustine; Augustine, Penal Legislation in the New Code of Canon Law, N. Y., 1920. (F. T. R.)

Sentences, The Book of the, the work of the theologian, Peter Lombard (c. 1100-c. 1162). He wrote the four “Books of the Sentences,” 1145-1151, and is called the Master of the Sentences, or the Master. The first book treats of God and the Trinity, Providence, predestination, and evil; the second, of creation, the angels, the fall, grace, and sin; the third, of the Incarnation, Redemption, the virtues, and commandments; the fourth, of the Sacraments and the four last things. He compiled the two tendencies of the period, speculation and authority, and owed much to other authors. The work was the standard textbook on theology down to the 16th century, and greatly influenced the work of St. Thomas Aquinas. (J. J. R.)

Sentinel of the Blessed Sacrament, The, official organ of the People’s Eucharistic League, published in New York City by the Fathers of the Blessed Sacrament to foster a greater reverence for the Most Blessed Sacrament; founded 1898; circulation, 18,429.

Separation, Matrimonial. The separation of husband and wife, or a limited divorce from bed and board, without the right of remarriage until the death of one of parties, is sometimes permitted by the Church on account of adultery, or lapse into heresy, or the entrance into a religious life on the part of husband or wife. The common married life ceases but the marriage bond remains intact (1 Cor. 7; Mark, 10; Matt., 19). If there is a grave danger to the body or soul of one of the parties, a temporary separation is permitted until the danger ceases.—Ayrinhac, Marriage Legislation in the New Code of Canon Law, N. Y., 1919. (G. A. F.)

Separatists, a German religious social organization originating in Wurttemberg about the beginning of the 19th century. Many of its members emigrated to America, 1817, under the leadership of Joseph Blumeler and settled at Zoar, Ohio. They discontinue military service, oaths, all ceremonies and sacraments in worship, and strove to cultivate an austere piety. Marriage was permitted, but celibacy was recommended. All members were required to pass through a probation, and community of goods was practised. (F. K.)

September (Lat., septem, seven; seventh month of the Roman year), month of special devotion to the Seven Sorrows of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

Septimius Severus (146-211), Roman emperor, b. Leptis Magna, Africa; d. York, England. Legate of the fourth legion on the Euphrates and later governor of Upper Germania, he was proclaimed emperor by the Danube legions, 193. At the battle near Lyons, 197, he conquered his rival Albinus. Severus labored to reorganize the Empire on the model of an Oriental despotism and favored the provinces rather than Italy, basing his power on the Pretorian Guard. The fifth persecution of the Christians broke out during his reign. —C.E.

Septuagesima Sunday (Lat., seventieth), within the seventh decade, or space of 70 days, before Easter, marking the beginning of the penitential season with the wearing of purple vestments and the omission of the Alleluia. In earlier days a part of the week was given to fasting and abstinence in preparation for the more rigid observance of Lent. Among the Greeks called Prodigal Son Sunday from the subject of the Gospel which they read on this day.—C.E.

Septuagint (Gr., seventy), the name given to the Greek translation of the O.T. made from the Hebrew by different authors, between 300 and 130 B.C., and given by Theodotion, Peter Lombard, and others. The Old Latin, Coptic, Ethiopic, and Orthodox. This version was revised by Theodotion, a Jewish proselyte (c. A.D. 185), Origen (228-254), and others. The Old Latin, Coptic, Ethipio, and other versions are based on the Septuagint.—C.E.; Gigot; Grannan; Swete, Introduction to the Old Testament in Greek, Camb., 1909. (T. O.)

Sepulcher, The Holy. See Holy Sepulcher.

Sequence. (1) A hymn of joy following the Gradual in the Mass of certain joyous feasts, to denote in a special way the joyous character of the Mass, e.g., Lauda Sion Salvatorem, from the Mass of “Corpus Christi.” (2) The hymn “Dies irae, dies illa” in Requiem Masses is not a sequence properly so-called.—C.E., XII, 481. (C. J. B.)

Seraphic Order, name applied to the Franciscan Order, founded by St. Francis of Assisi, the Seraphic Father, so called because of a vision in which a seraph was given to him.

Seraphim, those angels who compose the highest of the nine choirs. The word, masculine plural in form, is taken from the Hebrew and is probably derived from a root which means “to consume with fire," indicating the intensity of their love of God. In Scripture (1s., 6), they are pictured as the immediate attendants at the throne of God.—C.E.; O'Connell, The Holy Angels, N. Y., 1923. (A. J. S.)

Serbian, Croatian, and Slovene State (Yugoslavia), monarchy of Europe, on the Adriatic Sea; area, 96,134 sq. m.; pop. (1921), 12,017,323. As early as the 1st century Christianity was preached in parts of this country; Dalmatia, at least, was visited then by St. Titus who, according to tradition, founded a see at Salona and was martyred there. The only general persecution which is known to have been enforced with great severity in this part of the Roman Empire was that under Diocletian, in 303. Two bishops and martyrs who suffered there were St. Domnic and St. Quirinus. St. Jerome was a Dalmatian. Several sees continued long to be centers for the spread of the faith; e.g., Salona sent missionaries into Bosnia and Herzegovina, and there were six dioceses in those districts in the 6th century. The growth and organization of the Church was checked by warfare and confusion during centuries of invasions of barbarians. From the 7th century the immigrant Croats and Serbs began to adopt Christianity; in the 9th century especially there was a missionary movement which reestablished the Church over the large region including the present Yugoslavia and neighboring states. It was mainly Latin Christianity, with western civilization, which was adopted by the Croats and Serbs, to whom missionaries from Rome were sent by two 7th-century popes. In the 9th century the Greek missionaries, Sts. Cyril and Methodius, learned Slavonic in order to preach in the Balkan countries, and they translated the Gospels and the Greek liturgical books. It is thought that they, and possibly also St. Jerome, devised wholly or in part the alphabet known as Glagolitic and Cyrillic, used in several dioceses of Yugoslavia. In the 11th and 12th centuries, while the Balkan Peninsula was subject to the Byzantine Empire, the Byzantine Church grew increasingly influential there, and a ruler in Serbia in 1249 made adherence to the "Latin heresy" punishable by death. At this time, in Croatia alone, there were 3 archidioceses and 17 dioceses with an average of over 400 parishes in each; but from then on Christianity was seriously endangered by invasions of Turks. During periods of Turkish rule many of the population, especially of the nobility, became Mohammedans and large numbers of Christians emigrated, until, through the intervention of the Franciscan Angelus Zojedovic, permission was obtained from the sultan for free exercise of the Christian religion. Since the time of Turkish supremacy the various divisions of the country have been ruled by neighboring nations or have had short periods of independence, until the formation of the present independent kingdom in 1918 and 1921. By its constitution all religions recognized by law have the same rights, and religious instruction in the public schools is to be given to groups of pupils according to the wish of their parents. Sergius I, Saint, Pope (687-701), b. Antioch, Syria; d. Rome. During his pontificate many Englishmen visited Rome. He baptized Cædwalla, King of the West Saxons, 689; installed St. Wilfrid in the See of Canterbury; sent Willibrord as missionary to the Frisians; and received at Rome monks from the monastery of Sts. Peter and Paul, and Altilheim, the practical founder of Malmesbury Abbey. He confirmed the election of the first doge of Venice, 700; extinguished the Three Chapters schism in Aquileia; incorporated the Agnus Dei in the Mass; and beautified many basilicas. He refused to sign the decrees of the Trullan Council, 692, and was protected by the Romans from the cruelty of Emperor Justinian II. Feast, 9 Sept.—C.E.; Mann. Sergius II, Pope (844-847), b. Rome; d. there. A cardinal-priest, his election was disputed by the antipope John. As pope he crowned Louis the Pious, King of the Lombards, 814. During his pontificate Rome was threatened by an attack from the Saracen pirates, 846.—C.E.; Mann. Sergius III, Pope (904-911), b. Rome; d. there. Little is known of his life except from the writings of his enemies. During his pontificate he declared the ordinances conferred by Formosus null, 904; opposed the errors of the Greeks on the question of the Descent of the Holy Ghost, and declared the fourth marriage of the Greek emperor, Leo VI, valid.—C.E.; Mann. Sergius IV, Pope (1009-112), b. Rome; d. there. He was Bp. of Albano. As pope he broke the power of the Patriarch, John Crescentius, who had dominated Rome. He gave food to the poor during a famine; and promoted monasticism by granting many ecclesiastical privileges.—C.E.; Mann. Sergius and Bacchus, Saints, Martyrs (c. 303). They were officers in the employ of the Emperor Maximian, Sergius being primicerius and Bacchus secundarius; they were held in high esteem by their master until they acknowledged that they were Christians. Bacchus died at Arabissus in Cappadocia under the blows inflicted at their examination. Sergius was subjected to numerous other tortures and was finally beheaded at Resapha in Syria. This city was rebuilt by the Emperor Justinian, the name was changed to Sergiopolis, and it was made an archiepiscopal see. Many churches were built in their honor in the East and they are the titular saints of a church at Rome. They are represented in art in military garb. Sergius is patron of Syria. Emblem: a palm. Part of the relics of St. Sergius are said to be in Rome. Feast, R. Cal., 7 Oct.—C.E.; Butler.

Sermon (Lat., sermon, speech), a formal discourse of a sacred character, as opposed to homilies (informal explanations of Scripture) and instructions (catechetical teachings); a response of the pontiff to a set address, or a set address of the pontiff himself. When the pope preaches, the sermon is always called a homily, as in the Sermon on the Mount, the first instructions given by Our Lord on the Mount of Beatitudes, so called from the opening topic of the sermon and supposed to be Karn Hattin, or the Horus of the village Hattin nearby. This mountain is 1816 ft. high, but the sermon was preached on the upland at the base. The sermon takes up three chapters of St. Matthew (5, 6, 7) and contains a complete outline of Christianity. See BEATITUDES.

Serpent, an emblem of Satan and sin. The tempter appeared in that form to our first parents in Eden. In Christian art it is often placed beneath the feet of the Blessed Virgin “the seed of the woman shall crush his head.” In the same sense, it is associated with St. Patrick, St. Hilary, and St. Honorat. On the other hand, a serpent twined around a cross is an emblem of Our Lord, recalling the brazen serpent which Moses erected to cure the Israelites in the desert. (J. F. S.)

Serra, Junipero (1713-84), Franciscan missionary, b. Petra, Majorca; d. Monterey, Cal. Joined missionary college of San Fernando, Mexico, in 1749, and became famous as a fervent preacher, making long journeys on foot, though suffering much from lameness. In 1767 he was appointed superior of the Franciscan missions in Lower California, and in 1769 founded the first mission in Upper California. Difficulties with the military governor compelled Serra to appeal to the viceroy, who decided in his favor. In 1778 the faculty of administering Confirmation was granted. His principal writings are the “Representacion,” drawn up by the order of the viceroy; his “Diario,” and many letters.—C.E.

Servant of God, title given to persons into whose lives and virtues an inquiry is instituted with a view to having them declared Blessed. (Ed.)

Servant of the Servants of God, title used by the pope to express with humility his obligations to all who serve God. (Ed.)

Servetus, Michael, Spanish antitrinitarian and physician (c. 1511-53), b. Tudela, Navarre; d. Geneva, 1553. He studied at Toulouse, traveled in Germany, and, 1531, published his treatise, “De Trinitatis Erroribus,” a strong Unitarian work which caused a disturbance among the more orthodox reformers, who denounced him as “a wicked and cursed Spaniard.” He disputed with Calvin at Paris, 1534, studied medicine and discovered the lesser circulation of the blood. When his “Christianismi Restitutio” appeared, he was imprisoned and burnt in effigy in Vienna. He arrived at Geneva, 13 Aug., 1553, when Calvin drew up 40 charges against him, as he felt that the stigma of heresy would cling to all Protestants if Servetus were not put to death. He was burned at the stake, 27 Oct., 1553.

Servile Work, a canonical expression defining work forbidden on Sundays and holy days. Protestantism, denying the authoritative visible Church, accepts necessary, without observing it, the Jewish law. The Church distinguishes between the Divine law of worship, and the mode of observance determinable by legitimate authority, and forbids in general works characteristic of servile condition, to which others are added, specifically (Canon 1248) indicating secular business and public burdens as the norm of determining what is forbidden.—P. C. Augustine.

Servite, See ORDER OF SERVANTS OF MARY.

Seth, the son of Adam, born after Abel’s murder, hence his name (Gen., 4). He is the direct ancestor of those holy patriarchs known as the Sethites, the best known being Noe. His descendants who were called the Sons of God remained faithful to God until they mingled with the accursed race of Cain (Gen., 6). Seth-wood or Shittim-wood, repeatedly mentioned in Exodus as the principal timber employed in the construction of the Tabernacle and its appurtenances. It is the wood of the shittah-tree (Is., 41; cf. Arab., sone; Egypt, shonete), the acacia, the same word designated the A. Milteo of Egypt and the A. Semplo of the desert. The Sempol is a gnarled and thorny tree, flourishing in the driest situations and scattered more or less abundantly over the whole of the Sinaitic peninsula and in the ravines.
which open on the Dead Sea, forming quite a characteristic feature of the desert landscape. Its wood is heavier than water, very hard and close-grained, of a fine orange-brown color with a darker heart, and admirably adapted for cabinet work; it is not attacked by insects and is well-nigh incorruptible. Highly valuable as it is, the Bedouins have for a long time used the wood of the segal for making charcoal. It is, however, perhaps better known commercially as yielding the gum arabic of trade and medicine.

Elizabeth Ann Seton

Elizabeth Ann Seton (1774-1821), foundress and first superior of the Sisters of Charity in the United States, b. New York; d. Emmitsburg, Md. Daughter of Dr. Richard Bayley, she was born in 1774, and was left a widow with five children in 1803. Becoming a convert in 1805, she went to Baltimore to open a school for girls. Here a new community was founded by her, modelled on the Sisters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul, of which she was elected superior. Mother Seton with 18 sisters made her vows in 1813. The cause of her beatification is in process.—C.E.; De Barberey, Elizabeth Seton, N. Y., 1927.

Seton Hall College, South Orange, N. J., founded, 1856; conducted by the diocesan clergy; schools of arts and sciences, education; graduate schools; professors, 40; students, 903; degrees conferred in 1929, 68.

Seton Hill College, Greensburg, Pa., founded 1883; conducted by the Sisters of Charity of Mother Seton; preparatory school; college of arts and sciences; summer school; professors, 18; students, 303; degrees conferred in 1929, 47.

Seven-Branched Candlestick. This conspicuous article of furniture of the Holy Place (Ex., 25, 37), from its purpose and make-up would be better styled a lampstand. It was made of one talent of pure gold (hence the expression, "the most pure candlestick," of Ex., 31, etc.) and was of beaten, or repoussé, work. It consisted of a central shaft, from which three pairs of arms branched off, curving outwards and upwards so that all their extremities and that of the shaft were on a level. Both the shaft and the branches bore ornaments (Donu Verdon, cups, bowls, lilies) in the shape of almond-tree blossoms; on the top of each branch rested a lamp of gold, probably of the ordinary pattern used in ancient times. The golden candlestick was placed along the south wall of the Holy Place, facing the table of the loaves of proposition, the nozzles of the lamps being turned towards the north. Only the best kind of olive-oil (the so-called virgin oil, "beaten with a pestle," Ex., 27) was to be used in these lamps, which, trimmed every morning and refilled every evening, were to burn continually (Ex., 27; Lev., 24). The Bible does not say what became of the original seven-branched candlestick. In its place in Solomon's Temple there were ten lampstands (3 Kings, 7), which were part of the tribute paid by the Egyptians (586 B.C.). A new lampstand, perhaps of the old pattern, existed in the second temple and was carried off by Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Mac., 1). Judas Machabeus provided a new one (1 Mac., 4), somewhat different in shape from the one described in Exodus. There is no reason to doubt that this was the one taken away by the Romans after the destruction of the Temple, A.D. 70, and represented on the Arch of Titus, in Rome.

Seven Churches in Asia. They are Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamus, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, and Laodicea, mentioned in Apocalypse, 1-3, where Saint John, on the island of Patmos, was commanded to send to their bishops instructions and admonitions, in which the Church is praised or blamed with reference to past trials and told of a greater one to come in connection with the coming of Christ.

Seven Deacons, men elected by the original Christian community at Jerusalem and ordained by the Apostles, their office being chiefly to look after the poor, as the number of the Grecian Jews had rapidly increased and their widows and children were being neglected. The Apostles did not wish to be drawn away from preaching, and thus transferred these material duties to suitable men. They were St. Stephen (q.v.), St. Philip (q.v.), Prochorus, Nicanor, Timon, Parmenas, and Nicolas (Acts, 6).—C.E.

Seven Deadly Sins. See CAPITAL VICES.

Seven Holy Brothers, Saints, martyrs (Rome, 150). According to legend, they were the sons of St. Felicitas (q.v.), and suffered martyrdom under Emperor Antoninus. Januarius, Felix, and Philip were scourged to death; Silvanus was thrown over a precipice; and Alexander, Vitalis, and Martianus were beheaded. Feast, R. Cal., 10 July.

Seven Liberal Arts (Lat., artes liberales; from liber, free), name given in the Middle Ages to those branches of knowledge which train the free man, in contrast with the artes illiberales, those pursued for economic purposes. Their aim is to prepare the student for the pursuit of science, i.e., philosophy and theology combined, or scholasticism. Forming two groups, the liberal arts embrace: (1) the trivium, grammar, rhetoric, and dialectic, or the sciences of language, oratory, and logic; (2) the quadrivium, arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, and music. The language branches are considered as the lower, the mathematical branches as the intermediate, and science properly so called as the uppermost grade of studies. This system, which was used by the Greeks, Romans, and ancient Orientals, was developed during the Middle Ages, and continues to the present time.—C.E., I, 760.

Seven Robbers, martyrs (2nd century), d. island of Corcyra (now Corfu). Their names were Saturninus, Insiciolus, Faustus, Januarius, Marsalius, Euphrasius, Marcellus. They were convicted in prison by Sts. Jason and Sosipater, who had been arrested for preaching the faith throughout the island. According to tradition they were boiled in oil and pitch. Feast, 29 April.—C.E.
Seventh-day Adventists, a congregation of Adventists which observes the seventh day of the week as the Sabbath. Connected with this movement, begun in 1845 and 1846 in New England, were Joseph Bates, James White, and Mrs. Ellen G. White. At a conference in Battle Creek, Mich., in Oct., 1860, they adopted the official name, Seventh-day Adventist Church. They advocate complete separation of Church and State, oppose all religious legislation, and ban the use of tobacco and intoxicants. They have three periodicals. In 1916, outside the United States, there were in 92 countries: 248 mission stations; 353 substations; 880 American missionaries; and 2000 American missionaries. These stations are located as follows: Europe, 63; Africa, 47; Asia, 54; Australasia, 3; Pacific Islands, 36; South America, 22; West Indies, Mexico, and Central America, 24. These missions had: 1941 churches, 65,178 members; 237 schools, with 7208 pupils; 246 mission schools, 10,928 pupils; 21 sanitariums; and 1 orphanage. In 1923 there were in the United States: 835 ministers; 2235 churches and 112,255 communicants.

Seven Words of Christ, spoken from the Cross. The first word, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do" (Luke, 23), was spoken after they nailed Him to the cross. The second was addressed to the penitent thief. "I thirst" (John, 19), He addressed to the Blessed Virgin and St. John. Overcome by an agony of loneliness, He cried out the fourth word, "My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me?" (Matt., 27). Parched with thirst, He spoke the fifth word, "I thirst" (John, 19), when upon a soldier handed him a sponge soaked in vinegar. The sixth word, "It is consummated!" (John, 19), He uttered when every prophecy which had been foretold of Him had been fulfilled. "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit" (Luke, 23), was His seventh and last word. The devotion of the Three Hours, observed from midday on Good Friday, commemorates these words of Christ, Joseph Haydn and Theodore Dubois have interpreted them in oratorio form.

Severinus (Lat., severus, austere, stern), Pope (640), b. Rome; d. there. He was elected 638, but was unable to secure the imperial confirmation for over a year because he refused to sign the Ecthesis of Emperor Heraclius. As pope he condemned the Ecthesis. He renewed the mosaics in the apse of St. Peter's.—C.E.; Mann.

Severus, Alexander, Roman emperor (222-235), b. Acco, Palestine; d. Sicula on the Rhine. He succeeded his cousin, Elagabalus, to the imperial throne. Origen was invited by his mother, Manuma, to Antioch as his tutor. Severus respected Christianity and granted tolerance though there was some anti-Christian legislation in his reign. He was a disciple of "syracterism," uniting together against a common enemy, and strove to establish order and moral decency at Rome. He was murdered by his mutinous soldiers.—C.E.

Sévigné, Marie de Rabutin-Chantal, Marquise de (1626-96), letter-writer, b. Paris; d. Grignan, France. Having become an orphan when only six years old, she was educated by the Abbé de Contres, her uncle, who taught her Latin, Spanish, and Italian very thoroughly, and communicated to her his own practical spirit and deep sense of religion. Married at 18, she was a widow at 25, devoting all her time and energy to the education of her two children, Charles and Françoise-Margaret who became Marquise de Grignan and whom she idolized. It is to her separation from that daughter, who had to follow her husband to Provence, that we are indebted for most of her celebrated "Letters," which constitute one of the most fascinating monuments of French literature. The best editions of these were begun by Monmerqué in "Grands écrivains de France" (1865-67), and supplemented by Chapnus' "Lettres inédites de Madame de Sévigné" (1876).—C.E. (f. r. b.)

Seville (Lat., Hispalis), city in southern Spain. The capital of a Roman province, Seville was the seat of a bishop as early as 287. The Moors seized the city in the 8th century, and Christianity was not restored until the conquest of Ferdinand III in 1248. The cathedral, rebuilt on the site of a mosque (1403-1506), is an amazing structure, second only in size to St. Peter's, Rome. The city was the scene of two provincial councils, 590 and 600; and it was the home of the holy brothers, Sts. Leander and Isidore, bishops of Seville (6th century). It possesses many old churches, among them St. Ildefonso dating from the Visigothic period, a university founded in 1502, and a museum containing many priceless Murillos. Seville is now the seat of a diocese having 1,111,000 Catholics, 400 churches, 1751 priests, 3204 sisters.

Septuagesima Sunday, (Lat., sixth), the eighth Sunday before Easter, is within the sixth decade of the space of 60 days before Easter, called Meatless Sunday in the Byzantine rite.—C.E.

Sext (Lat., sextus, six), in the Divine Office, the office of the sixth hour (midday), comprising an invariable hymn, three variable psalms, little chapter, response, and oration proper to the day.—C.E. (s. v. K.)

Sexton, a church official, usually a layman, with duties ranging from those of janitor to those of sacristan, such as caring for the church edifice and grounds, ringing the bell, and preparing graves.—C.E. (s. b.)

Shakespeare, Religion of.—William Shakespeare (1564-1616), poet and dramatist, was born at Stratford-on-Avon, England; d. there. Richard Davies, Anglican archdeacon, one of Shakespeare's earliest biographers, says "He dyed a Papyst." Davies could have had no conceivable motive for misrepresenting the matter, and as he lived in the neighboring county of Gloucestershire, he had the opportunity of knowing many of Shakespeare's contemporaries. Sir Sydney Lee, for years editor of the Dictionary of National Biography, disregards Archdeacon Davies's expression as only "a bit of late 18th-century gossip." However, it forms part of a series of documents registered as a gift to Corpus Shea, Sir Ambrose (1815-1905), b. Newfound land; d. London. A member of the House of Assembly of Newfoundland almost continuously from 1848-86, he represented the town of St. John's in the Legislative Assembly of Newfoundland on several important occasions and in reward for his services was made Knight Commander of the Order of St. Michael and St. George. As governor of the Bahama Islands (1887-93) he initiated the sisal fiber industry, organized a public bank, and laid the Bahama-Florida cable.—C.E.

Shea, John Dawson Gilmary (1824-92), historian, b. New York; d. Elizabeth, N. J. He spent several years in the Jesuit novitiate then left the order and devoted himself to the study of early Indian missions and published the "History of the Catholic Missions among the Indian Tribes of the United States, 1529-1854." He contributed articles on Indians to the "Encyclopedia Britannica," was literary editor of Frank Leslie's publications, and in 1888 became editor of "Catholic News." His great work is the "History of the Catholic Church in the United States."—C.E.; Guilday, John Gilmary Shea, N. Y., 1926.

Shekel (D.V. Stelle; Heb., sheqel, to weigh), an ancient unit of weight of the Babylonians, Phenicians, and Hebrews, equal to one sixtieth of a pound. It was also the name of the chief silver coin of the Hebrews, and is mentioned in the Bible (Gen., 24; Ex., 30; 2 Kings, 14). Its value was about one-third of a dollar.

Sheol, she'-ol (Heb., a cave). In the O.T. times it was the place where the souls of the dead abide: the land of oblivion (Ps. 88); called Hades in the Greek N.T. (Luke, 16), and later used as a synonym for Gehenna, the hell of torments, the Latin infernum. Souls were treated according to their merit; the just looked for liberation.

Shepherd, John (c. 1512-c. 1563), composer, b. England; d. there. A chorister under Thomas Mulliner at St. Paul's, he became in 1542 choirmaster and organist at Magdalen College, Oxford, and in 1549 gained a fellowship. From 1553-58 he belonged to Mary Tudor's Chapel Royal. The Music School, Oxford, has preserved in MSS. many of his religious compositions. Notable selections are four masses, several alleluias, and ten motets. —C.E.

Shepherd of Hermas, name of a treatise highly esteemed in early times and once ranking next to the Holy Scriptures. It is an ethical rather than a theological work, preaching repentance, and consisting of five visions, twelve mandates, and two parables; particularly valuable as a contemporary record of 2nd-century Christianity in Rome. The authorship has been attributed to Hermas, mentioned by St. Paul in his letter to the Romans, 14; but with more likelihood, to a brother of Pope St. Pius I.—C.E., VII, 208.

Sherborne Abbey, Dorsetshire, England, founded, 998; the place having been chosen two centuries earlier by St. Aldhelm, as the seat of the Bishop of Western Wessex. Bishop Wulfsey III introduced the Benedictine Rule. At the consecration, 1536, the conventual buildings went to the school, which was re-founded in 1550. Sherborne School is now a leading public school. The abbey church remains the parish church of the town.—C.E.

Sherbrooke, Diocese of, Quebec; comprises Sherbrooke, Compton, Richmond, Stanstead, Wolfe, and a portion of Brome, Frontenac, Sheffield, and Beauce counties; suffragan of Montreal. Bishops:

Antoine Racine (1874-93); Paul La Rocque (1892-1926); Alphonse O. Gagnon (1927). Churches, 99; priests, secular, 201; priests, regular, 22; religious women, 807; seminary, 1; normal school, 1; academies and boarding schools, 41; primary schools, 420; institutions, 3; Catholics, 160,104.

Shibeboleth or Sibboleth (Heb., ear of corn), a word used by Jephte as a password by which to distinguish the fleeing Ephraimites from his own men, the Galaadites. If they could not pronounce it, and said “sibboleth” instead, they were put to death (Judges, 12); in modern times, a password, a slogan, a peculiarity of pronunciation or accent which indicates a person’s origin.

Shintoism (Chinese, shin, god; tao, way), the original national religion of Japan, now professed by about 19,000,000 people. It has neither dogmas nor sacred writings, and is a strange compound of pantheism and the worship of ancestors and heroes. It teaches that all nature is controlled by gods, from whom the first emperor sprang; hence the mikado is the descendant of the deity, and is the high-priest. Its moral code can be reduced to these principles: follow the inspiration of your own heart, and obey the emperor. In A.D. 552, Buddhism was united with Shintoism, and the fusion, known as Rio-bu-Shinto, was the national religion until 1868, when a revolution separated the two.---C.E.---VT. III, 504; XVII, 269; XII, 169.

Ships, Blessing of, a rite which has been in existence since the time of the Crusades. It consists of prayers to be offered by the priest, supplicating God to bless the vessel and protect those who sail in it, as He protected the ark of Noe, and also Peter, when the latter was sinking in the sea; the ship is then sprinkled with holy water.

Shiré, Vicariate Apostolic of, Nyassaland Protectorate; eastern central Africa; bounded n. by South Nyassa District; e., s., and w. by Portuguese Mozambique; entrusted to the Missionaries of the Society of Mary; mission, 1901; prefecture, 1903; vicariate 1908. Vicar Apostolic: Louis Aumeau (1911). Residence at Limbe. Churches, 2; chapels, 23; stations, 26; priests, regular, 24; religious women, 12; elementary schools, 296; pupils, 17,530; Catholics, 20,000.

Shiva, in Hindu mythology, a god who forms the trinity with Brahma and Vishnu; as the former is the creator, and the latter the preserver, so Shiva is the destroyer. But as death is a new form of life, the destroyer is really a re-creator, and thus Shiva is called the Bright or Happy One. His name does not occur in the Vedas, but in later Hinduism he is an important divinity.

Shrewsbury, Diocese of, England; comprises Shropshire and Cheshire; suffragan of Birmingham. Bishops: James Brown (1881-91), Edmund Knight (1882-95), John Carroll (1895-97), Samuel Allen (1897-1908), and Hugh Singleton (1908). Statistics: churches and chapels, 85; priests, secular, 90; priests, regular, 22; elementary schools, 38; other schools, 13; charitable institutions, 1; Catholic population, 78,820.

Shrine (Lat., scrinium, case or chest for books or papers, the box, casket, or other repository in which the relics of a saint are preserved; also, a tomb-like erection of rich workmanship enclosing the same. See Pilgrimages.

Shrines in Great Britain and Ireland. In England, famous shrines of Our Lady were at Abingdon, Canterbury, Caversham, Coventry, Elwy, Evesham, Glastonbury, Ipswich, Tewkesbury, Walsingham, Worcester, and Lincoln; in Scotland, at Aberdeen, Edinburgh, Haddington, and Musselburgh; in Ireland, at Dublin, Muckross, Navan, and Trim. Celebrated shrines of the saints were those of St. Thomas Becket, St. Edward the Confessor, St. Patrick, St. Vincent, St. Gilbert of Sempringham, St. Kentigern of Scotland, St. Cuthbert of Lindisfarne, St. Albans, St. Swithin, St. Osmond, St. Oswald, St. Aidan, St. Ninian, St. Thomas, Bp. of Hereford, St. Wilfrid, St. Hugh, and St. Edmund.---C.E.

Shroud, The Holy. This name is given primarily to a relic, preserved at Turin, Italy, since 1578, for which the claim is made that it is the actual “clean linen coat” in which Joseph of Arimathea wrapped the body of Jesus Christ (Matt., 27), after the Crucifixion. It is a cloth about 13½ ft. long and 4½ ft. wide; and, though blackened by age, bears the faint but distinct impress of a human form, both back and front; it was first heard of in 1390 at Lirey in the diocese of Troyes. The authenticity of the Holy Shroud is not questioned in various pronouncements of the Holy See, although other shrouds exist elsewhere, notably those of Champaigne, Besançon, Xabregas, and Cadouin. In 1901, Dr. Paul Vignon read a paper before the Académie des Sciences in which he maintained the image upon the shroud was a natural negative of the Sacred Body, and as such was completely beyond the skill of any medieval forger.---C.E.

Shrovetide (Old English, to shrive, i.e., hear confessions), Monday and Tuesday (also sometimes the preceding Thursday) before Ash Wednesday, known in southern Europe as the Carnival (curawmen lecare, taking away of flesh); period of festivity before Lent.---C.E.

Shuswap Indians, a North American Indian tribe (Su-khapmuh), most important of Salishan linguistic stock in British Columbia, including groups at Kamloops, Adams Lake, Alkali Lake, Canoe Creek, Neskahtinth, Spallumcheen, and Williams Lake. In their primitive condition the Shuswaps lived by hunting, fishing, and gathering berries. Their semi-subterranean houses were built of logs and covered with earth. Their weapons were the bow, lance, stone axe, and club. Their tribal organization was without central authority, Village chests were hereditary; the people were divided into nobles, commons, and slaves. There were no clans; descent was patriarchal. Their religion was animism. They are now nearly all Catholic; their missions are at Williams Lake and Kamloops. They were visited by the Jesuits in the 17th century and later by the Oblates.—C.E.

Siam, monarchy of southeastern Asia; area, 200,148 sq. m.; pop. (1925-26), 9,831,000. It is thought that the first Christian missionary in this region was a French Franciscan, Bonfire, who preached there about 1550. In 1554 two Dominicans, Frs. Hieronymus of the Cross and Sebastiano de Cantho, came as chaplains to the Portuguese soldiers who were in the service of the king of Siam; they established three parishes and made many converts. Both were murdered in 1569, but others soon took their places, and in spite of intermittent persecution, in which there were additional martyrs, the work was continued by the same orders and by others, including Jesuits and Augustinians. In 1662 a Vicariate Apostolic of Siam was founded; this has since been reduced in extent and renamed Bangkok; since 1669 it has been under the care of the Society of Foreign Missions of Paris. Siam became a refuge for hundreds of Christians who fled from persecution in Annam and Japan. The Church there has often been protected and assisted by the kings, particularly Phra-Narat in the 17th century and Mongkut and Chulalongkorn in the 19th and 20th, though many local mandarins and Burmese invaders have been hostile. Buddhism is the state religion. Catholic statistics:

Sibylline Books, collections of supposed prophecies of seersesses. Originally the Sibyls were pagan prophetesses, whose utterances written in hexameter verse were preserved in Rome and other places. In the 2nd century, n.c., the Hellenistic Jews, for propaganda purposes, issued verses similar in form to the Sibylline prophecies; and later, certain Christians in the early centuries did the same, for the like purpose of disseminating the doctrines of their religion.—C.E. Sichem, sêkên (Heb., shoulder), Israelite city n. of Bethel and Silo, in the tribe of Ephraim; first capital of the Kingdom of Israel, noted as the burial-place of Joseph (Jos., 24).—C.E.

Sic patres vitam peragunt in umbra, or The Fathers Lived a Life in Shade, hymn for Lauds on 12 Feb., Feast of the Seven Holy Founders. It was written by Vincent Tarozzi (1849-1918). The English title given above is by C. Paul.—Britt.

Sidon, ancient Phrenician seaport, 67 m. from Caisarea, between Mt. Lebanon and the Mediterranean, where St. Paul stopped on his voyage to Rome (Acts, 27). The modern port, Saida, is west of Sidon.—C.E.

Siena, city in Tuscany, Italy. The ancient city (Saena) was the center of a diocese in the 5th century. It was ruled in the 11th and 12th centuries by bishops who were also temporal lords of the surrounding country. A consular system was adopted in 1125, and from this time the history of the expanding republic is one of constantly changing government and continual strife. It was finally incorporated into Tuscany in 1557, and annexed to the kingdom of Italy in 1800. Gothic architecture produced in Siena its most excellent monuments, among which is the 13th-century cathedral containing numerous valuable paintings and sculptures. Siena was the home of the artists Duccio, Simone Martini (1285-1344), and the brothers Pisani; of many saints, including Caterina Benincasa, Bernardino, Rodolfo, and Gaetano; and of the illustrious Gigi, and Cardinal Piccolomini. The city is now the seat of an archdiocese having 83,000 Catholics, 324 churches and chapels, 275 priests, 117 sisters.

Sierra Leone, VICARIATE APOTOLIC OF, Western Africa; comprises the colony of that name and the surrounding territory, from French Guinea on the north and east to Liberia on the south; entrusted to the Fathers of the Holy Ghost of Norwalk, Conn., established 1858. Vicar Apostolic: John O’Gorman, C.S.S.P. (1903). Residence at Freetown. Missions, 20; stations, 18; schools, 12; high schools, 4; mission schools, 20; pupils in schools, 1363; orphanage, 1; Catholics, 3250.

Sign, The, organ of the archconfraternity of the Sacred Passion, and official organ of the Passionist Chinese Missions, published monthly in Union City, N. J., by the Passionist Fathers; founded 1921; circulation, 75,000.

Sign of the Cross, THE. This is the most important of the sacramentals. It is a symbol of our deliverance from Satan, and an emblem of God’s mercy as manifested through the crucifixion of Our Saviour. It consists in making a movement with the hands, or with some object, in the form of a cross. The ordinary method is to put the right hand to the forehead, and to the breast, each with a small cross, and to the left and the right shoulder, saying: “In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen.” The words and the action form a summary of the Catholic faith in God and the Redemption. We say “In the name”—expressing the unity of God; we mention the three Persons of the Trinity; the cross itself, made with the hand, manifests our belief in the Incarnation, death, and resurrection of Our Saviour, and shows that we regard Him not only as God but as man—for otherwise He could not die. The use of this sign goes back probably to the days of the Apostles. The triple sign of the cross was common in the Middle Ages, but is not now generally used except at the beginning of the Gospels at Mass. It is made by marking the forehead, the lips, and the breast, each with a small cross, using the thumb, and reminds us that we should worship God with our minds, our lips, and our hearts. The sign of the cross is made at the beginning and end of public and private prayers, in the administration of all the sacraments, and in all the Church’s blessings, over the people, the person, or the objects. In Baptism it is made 14 times; in Extreme Unction, 17 times; in the blessing of holy water, 12 times; and in the Mass, various ways, 51 times. An indulgence of 50 days is gained every time we make it properly.—C.E.

Sikhism, religion of a warlike sect of India, originating in the Punjab and centered in the holy city of Amritsar. Nanak, a Hindu of the Kshatriya caste founded this sect, c. 1500. The name Sikh signifies “disciple,” and the strict observants were called Khalsa. The religious system, a revolt from polytheism, ceremonialism, and caste-exclusiveness, took for its chief doctrines the oneness of God, salvation by faith and good works, and the equality and brotherhood of man. Continual persecutions reduced the power of the Sikhs, but they maintained their religious distinctiveness. Their sacred books, called the “Granth,” are preserved and venerated at Amritsar.—C.E.
Silence (Lat., silere, to be still), abstention from exterior occupation, especially conversation, that the mind may the better apply itself to pious thoughts, to meditation, or to prayer; interior silence consists in banishing wilful distractions and awaiting the inspirations of the Holy Ghost. Both are necessary preliminaries to effective prayer. In the religious life silence is kept the greater part of the day; the period between evening prayer and morning Mass is known as the Great Silence, admitting a breach only for the gravest of reasons.—C.E.
Siloe, st-iwë, pool in the Tyropoön valley, just outside the south wall of Jerusalem, where Christ gave sight to a man born blind (John, 9).—C.E.
Simon (Heb., peace or rest), city of Ephraim, noted of Bethel (Judges, 21); for three centuries after the conquest of the Promised Land, it was the dwelling-place of the Tabernacle and the Ark of the Covenant (Jos., 18). The modern Seilun.
Simon, surnamed Thasi, brother of Judas Machabeus (1 Mac., 2); (3) Simon of the tribe of Benjamin, governor of the Temple (2 Mac., 3); (4) Simon who is called Peter, the Apostle (Matt., 4); (5) Simon the Cananean, the Apostle (Matt., 10); (6) one of the relatives of Our Lord, identified erroneously with the preceding (Matt., 13); (7) Simon the leper, a resident of Bethany (Matt., 26); (8) a Pharisee, at whose house the penitent woman washed the feet of Jesus (Luke, 7); (9) Simon the Cyrenian, who helped Our Lord carry the Cross (Matt., 27); (10) the father of Judas (John, 6); (11) Simon Magus, a magician in the time of the Apostles (Acts, 8); (12) Simon the tanner, a Christian of Joppé, in whose house Peter had the vision commanding him to receive the Gentiles into the faith (Acts, 10); (13) Simon called Niger, a Christian living at Antioch in the time of the Apostles (Acts, 13).—Williams, Concordance of the Proper Names in the Holy Scriptures, St. L., 1923.
Simon, Saint, Apostle, called the Cananean (Matt., 10; Mark, 3) and the Zealot (Luke, 6; Acts, 1) to distinguish him from St. Peter. From the first it has been wrongly inferred by St. Jerome and others that he was a native of Cana, whereas both names are a translation of the Hebrew word zealos. Nor does the name Zealot signify that he was a member of the party called by that name, but rather indicates his zeal for the Jewish law. After his conversion and call to the apostleship, Simon directed his zeal and fidelity to the service of Christ. Details concerning Simon’s later life are uncertain and often confused. The Greeks, Copts, and Ethiopians identify him with Nathanael of Cana; the Abyssinians relate that he suffered crucifixion as Bp. of Jerusalem, after he had preached the gospel in Samaria, confusing him with Simeon, Bp. of Jerusalem (q.v.) ; according to the Greeks he preached on the Black Sea, and in Egypt, Northern Africa, and even in Ethiopia; but the recent Aramaic tradition holds that he labored in Persia. The manner and place of his death are likewise obscure; he may have died in peace at Edessa; the Latins claim that he was martyred at Susain in Colchis; the Armenians believed that he was martyred at Weriosphora.

Simon, SAINT, Apostle. His name occurs in all lists of the Apostles in the Gospels and Acts. He was called Kananaos or Kananites, and Zeleotes, both surnames being a translation of a Hebrew word meaning "the zealous," because he had zeal for the Jewish law. There is no certainty as to where he preached the Gospel. The saw is usually his attribute, with reference to his manner of martyrdom. He is regarded as the patron of tanners. In the West he is venerated with St. Jude (Thaddeus), 28 October; in the East separately, 10 May.—C.E.; Butler.

Simon Magus, according to the testimony of St. Justin, a native of Gitta. He was converted by the preaching of Philip in Samaria and was baptized. When the Apostles Peter and John came to give the Holy Ghost to the believers, Simon offered them money for the power of bestowing the Holy Spirit and was severely rebuked by St. Peter. He begged the Apostles to pray for him (Acts, 8). According to legend Simon came to Rome and won many adherents by his magic. Another version makes him the chief antagonist of St. Peter. By magic he rose in the air, but the prayers of the Apostles Peter and Paul caused him to fall. In the traditions of the 2nd century he was regarded as head of a heretical sect called Simonians.—C.E.

Simon of Cyrene, a resident of Cyrene in Libya, the father of Alexander and Rufus; he was forced to carry the Cross of Our Saviour for part of the journey to Calvary (Matt., 27; Mark, 15).—(J. M. N.)

Simon Peter, See Peter, SAINT.

Simon Stock, see SIMON THE ENGLISHMAN, SAINT, confessor (c. 1165-1265), general of the Carmelite Order, b. Kent, England; d. Bordeaux, France. According to tradition, from the age of 12 he lived as a hermit in the hollow trunk of an oak tree, whence he was called Simon Stock. He later joined the Carmelite Order, traveled to Rome and Mt. Carmel, and in 1247 was elected sixth general of the Order. Under his rule it spread rapidly in England and throughout southern and western Europe. He established communities in the university cities, Cambridge, 1248, Oxford, 1253, Paris and Bologna, 1260, and revised the Rule, making it more adaptable to European conditions. Later legends relate how the Mother of God appeared to him during a period of great oppression of the Order, and invested him in the scapular, granting the privilege that anyone who dies wearing the scapular is not eternally lost. The antiphonies of St. Simon, "Plais Carmeli" and "Ave Stella Matutina," show his particular devotion to the Blessed Virgin, represented receiving the scapular from the Blessed Virgin, Relics in the cathedral at Bordeaux. Feast, 16 May.—C.E., Butler.

Simony. The word is derived from the name of Simon Magnus, a converted magician, who tried to buy the Gifts of the Holy Ghost from St. Peter, in the first years of the Church. (Acts, 8). Simony is the sacrilegious conveying of ecclesiastical offices and benefices to which spiritual jurisdiction is attached. It was common during the Middle Ages, but especially in the 9th and 10th centuries, and was one of the remote but powerful causes of the Protestant revolt of the 16th century. Episcopal sees were bought by profligate men without training and even without Apostolic foundation. The Church has repeatedly and strongly condemned this vice in the encyclicals of Popes and Synods, but never was her condemnation more strong than in the decrees of St. Gregory VII.—C.E.; Weber, A History of Simony in the Christian Church, Balt., 1909. (E. B. B.)

Simple Feast (Lat., festum simplex). A festival of lower rank than a "double" or a "semi-double." The Office is said in a very simple form, with the psalms of the three nocturnes recited in one nocturne only. —(J. V. B.)

Simplicius (Lat., simplex, simple, frank), SAINT, Pope (468-483), b. Italy; d. Rome. His pontificate, which saw the Western Empire fall under barbarian control, was disturbed by the Monophysite controversy in the East. He defended the independence of the Church against the encroachments of the Emperor Zeno, who sought to have his Henotikon recognized by Rome, 482; upheld the authority of the pope in matters of faith, in opposition to the future schismatic patriarch, Acacius; condemned Peter Mungus, Fullo, Paul of Ephesus, and John of Apamea; and built four churches in Rome. Feast, R. Cal., 2 March.—C.E.; Butler.

Sin, a voluntary transgression of the law of God. It is a transgression (Lat., trans, beyond; gradus, to go) because it is an act whereby we go beyond the limits imposed on freedom. It is a voluntary transgression because it is committed knowingly and willingly. The law of God, which sin contravenes, comprises not only the natural and the Divine positive law, but also the just precepts of all legitimately constituted authority.—C.E.; Baierl, The Commandments Explained, Rochester, 1929; Manning, Sin and Its Consequences, N. Y., 1904; Slater, Manual of Moral Theology, N. Y., 1908.

Sinai, MOUNT, the "mountain of God" (Ex., 3), situated in the desert of Sinai, between the Gulf of Suez and the Gulf of Akabah, on which the Law was given to Moses (Ex., 31). The O.T. speaks of Mount Sinai and Mount Horeb as synonymous; some writers say they are two mountains of the same range, God appeared to Moses at Horeb from a burning bush, and told him He would deliver the Israelites from the Egyptians (Ex., 3); after the Exodus, Moses smote water from a rock in Horeb (Ex., 17). Mount Sinai, however, is most famous as the place where Moses received the tablets of the Law and spent 40 days and 40 nights with God (Ex., 19).—C.E.

Sins Against the Holy Ghost, sins that embody a stubborn resistance to the inspirations of the Holy Ghost, and an open contempt for His gifts. They are: despair of one's salvation; presumption of God's mercy; impugning the known truths of faith; envy of another's spiritual good; obstinacy in sin; final impenitence. Although no sin is absolutely unpardonable, those who sin against the Holy Ghost stubbornly resist the influence of grace and do not wish to repent. Hence their sin cannot be forgiven them.—C.E., VII, 414.

Sins That Cry to Heaven for Vengeance, sins for which the soul, on account of their manifest and heinous malice, cry, as it were, for vengeance, and call on Divine Justice to punish them signally. They are: wilful murder; sins against nature; oppression of the poor, of widows, and of orphans; defrauding laborers of their wages. (b. g. b.)

Sion (Zion), largest of the two hills to the south of the temple mount, on which the city of David was built, and which became the center of Jewish life and worship. Used to mean house or household of God, it connotes variously the Israelites and their religious system, the Christian Church, heaven as the final home of believers, a place of worship or meeting-house. It is of special interest as the site of the Cenacle, the first meeting-place of Christians, the scene of the Last Supper and of the Descent of the Holy Ghost.

Sioux City, Diocese of, established, 1902; embraces 24 counties in northwestern Iowa, west of Winnebago, Hancock, Wright, Hamilton, and Story Counties, and north of Harrison, Shelby, Audubon, Guthrie, and Dallas counties; area, 14,315 sq. m.; suffragan of Dubuque. Bishops: P. J. Garrigan (1902-1919); Edmund Heelan (1920). Churches, 146; priests, secular, 157; priests, regular, 13; religious women, 104; college, 1; academies, 3; parochial schools, 72; pupils in parochial schools, 12,144; institutions, 8; Catholics, 67,521.

Sioux Falls, Diocese of, established, 1899; embraces that part of South Dakota east of the Missouri River; area, 35,091 sq. m.; suffragan of St. Paul. Bishops: Martin Marty (1880-1894); Thomas O'Gorman (1896-1921); Bernard J. Mahoney (1922). Churches, 189; priests, secular, 157; priests, regular, 9; religious women, 503; college, 1; academies, 2; parochial schools, 35; pupils in parochial schools, 6882; institutions, 7; Catholics, 60,741.

Siren, an animal resembling a jackal, mentioned in the Bible (Is., 13); the passage indicates an animal dwelling in ruins. A verbal resemblance only should be sought between this and the fabulous being, famous for its allure, called siren by the ancient poets and writers.

Siricius, Saint, Pope (384-399), b. Rome; d. there. His letter to Bp. Himerius of Spain, in which he exercised his supreme ecclesiastical authority on fifteen points of Catholic dogma, is the oldest and most completely preserved papal decretal. He condemned the heretics Jovinian and Bonosus, but at the same time he rebuked the over-anxious accusers of the heretic Priscillian. By recognizing Flavian as head of the See of Antioch he healed the Melian schism. Feast, R. Cal., 26 Nov.—C.E.

Sisinnius, Pope (708), b. Syria; d. Rome. Little is known of his pontificate except the fact that he consecrated a bishop for Corsica, and gave an order to restore the walls of Rome.—C.E.; Mann.

Sister, Sisterhoods, Sisters, titles used to designate the members of a community of religious women, devoted to spiritual and charitable work, usually dwelling in communities, and bound by vows. In the older orders a distinction is made between choir sisters, who are obliged by rule to say the Divine Office in common, and lay sisters, who are engaged principally in caring for the temporal needs of the community. In some congregations, e.g., the Daughters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul, the local superior is called sister servant.

Sisters of Charity.
—of Cincinnati, Ohio, originally a mission opened in 1829 by the Sisters of Charity of Emmitsburg, Md.; became a separate community in 1822 under the title, Sisters of Charity of Cincinnati, Ohio. The community has 74 houses, including schools, hospitals, orphanages, sanitariums, and a college, in the United States and China. The mother-house is at Mount St. Vincent, Ohio; the total number of sisters is 1080.—C.E.; McCann, The History of Mother Seton's Daughters, New York, 1922.

—of Jesus and Mary, a congregation founded by Rev. P. J. Triest in Ghent, Belgium, 1803, for teaching the young and nursing the infirm. The constitutions are taken from the Rules of St. Bernard and St. Vincent de Paul. The congregation has 62 houses, including boarding and day schools, institutes for the deaf, dumb, and blind, hospitals, sanitariums, homes for aged and incurables, lunatic asylums, and orphanages, in Belgium, Holland, England, the Belgian Congo, and India. The mother-house is at Ghent; religious total 1820.—C.E., Ill, 606.

—of Leavenworth, a community founded by Sister Xavier Ross, 1858, member of the Sisters of Charity of Nazareth, for the education and care of children and the care of the sick, in the unexplored territory of the West, where they accompanied the pioneer settlers. Their Rule is principally that of St. Vincent. The institute now has 50 houses, including schools, academies, a junior college, a hospital school for cripples, orphanages, hospitals, and a sanitarium, all in the United States. The mother-house is at Leavenworth; the number of professed sisters is 495.—C.E., Suppl., 180.

—of Nazareth, congregation founded by Rev. B. David at Nazareth, Ky., 1812, for the care of the poor and the sick, and the teaching of children. The congregation has 71 houses, including schools, orphanages, and hospitals, in the United States. The mother-house is at Nazareth; the total number of sisters is 1150.—McGill, The Sisters of Charity of Nazareth, Kentucky, N. Y., 1917.

—of Our Lady Mother of Mercy, a congregation founded in the Netherlands, 1832, by Rev. John Zwijsen assisted by Mary M. Leijzen. The instruction of children and the care of the sick and aged constitutes their work. The congregation has 103 houses, including schools, hospitals, orphanages, homes for the aged, and a leper colony, in the Netherlands, Belgium, England, the East and West Indies, and the United States. The mother-house is at Tilburg, the Netherlands; the total number of sisters is 3651.—C.E., III, 610.

—of Providence (Daughters of Charity, Servants of the Poor), founded by Bp. Bourget with the cooperation of Mme. J. B. Gamelin in Montreal, 1843, under the Rule of St. Vincent de Paul, to be devoted exclusively to works of charity undertaken at the bidding of their diocesan bishop. There are no lay sisters. The congregation has 104 houses, including hospitals, orphan asylums, homes, and Indian missions, in the United States, Canada, and Alaska. The mother-house is at Montreal; the total number of religious is 2733.—C.E., III, 609.

—of St. Augustine, a branch of the Sisters of St. Augustine of Arras, France, founded by Ernestine C. Caberet in Cleveland, O., 1851, for the education of the young and the care of the sick. The Rule of St. Augustine is followed. The order has 15 houses, including schools, an academy, and hospitals, all in Ohio. The mother-house is at Lakewood, O.; religious total 256.

—of St. Louis, a congregation founded at Vannes, France, 1803, by Madame Moliére, for educating poor girls. The congregation has houses, including schools, in France, England, Canada, and the United States. The mother-house is at Vannes, France.—C.E., III, 609.

—of St. Paul, a religious congregation founded at Chartres, 1764, by Mgr. Maréchaux, succeeded by Mlle. de Tilly and Mlle. de Tronchet, for teaching, visiting and nursing the poor, and caring for orphans, the aged, and the insane. In 1847 the sisters were introduced into England where they now have an independent branch. The sisters conduct schools, hospitals, asylums, dispensaries, orphanages, and creches, in France, Ireland, England, the French colonies, Siam, and the Philippine Islands.—C.E., III, 610.

—of St. Vincent de Paul (Halifax, Nova Scotia), a branch of the Sisters of Charity of Emmitsburg, Md., founded at Halifax, 1849, by several members of the New York foundation of that society. The education of the young and care of orphans and the sick constitutes their purpose. The congregation has 49 houses, including orphanages, foundling asylums, hostels for young women, schools, hospitals, and a home for aged women, in Canada, Bermuda, and the United States. The mother-house is at Halifax; the total number of sisters is about 1000.—C.E. Suppl. 178.

—of St. Vincent de Paul (Mt. St. Vincent-on-Hudson), a branch of the Sisters of Charity of Emmitsburg, Md., founded in New York, 1817, by several members of the order sent there by Mother Seton. Because of the proposed affiliation of the community at Emmitsburg with the Sisters of Charity in France, the New York community was established as an independent society, 1846. Their work is chiefly educational. But the congregation has 105 houses, including a college, academies, schools and business schools, orphanages, hospitals, nurseries, homes, in the United States and the Bahama Islands. The mother-house is at Mt. St. Vincent-on-Hudson, N. Y.; the total number of sisters is 1450.—C.E., III, 607.

—of St. Vincent de Paul (Newark), a community founded in 1859 at Newark, N. J., at the request of Bp. Bayley by Mother Mary Xavier Mehegan who had previously been a member of the Sisters of Charity in New York, and whose habit and constitutions were retained. The work consists chiefly of teaching but also includes the care of the poor and sick in charitable institutions. The community has 110 houses, including schools, one college, hospitals, and orphanages, in the United States and China. The mother-house is at Convent Station, N. J.; the total number of sisters is about 1500.—C.E., III, 608.

—of St. Vincent de Paul (Paris), congregation founded in Paris, 1853, by St. Vincent de Paul, Bl. Louise de Marillac, and Mlle. Le Grass for the practice of works of charity among the poor. Their official title is Daughters of Charity, Servants of the Sick Poor. St. Vincent drew up a Rule for them. Mother Seton (q.v.) introduced the community into the United States, 1809, founding a house in Emmitsburg, Md. The community has about 4000 houses, including homes, day nurseries, schools, colleges, hospitals, one leper home, social service centers, and moral reconstruction centers, in China, Persia, Syria, Palestine, Abyssinia, Algeria, Egypt, Congo, Madagascar, Tripoli, Tunis, Guatemala, Salvador, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Panama, in 24 states of the United States, Cuba, Porto Rico, and every country of South America except Guiana, Australia, and every country of Europe except Sweden and Russia. The mother-house is in Paris; the total number of sisters is about 40,000.—C.E., III, 605.

—of the Blessed Virgin Mary, a congregation begun in 1831 by five women in Dublin and established in Philadelphia, 1833, by Rev. T. Donoghoe, who is regarded as the founder. The work is educational. The congregation has 110 houses, including schools, academies, and colleges, all in the United States. The mother-house is in Dubuque, Ia.; the total number of sisters is 1025.—C.E., III, 609.

—of the General Hospital of Montreal (Grey Nuns), founded by Madame d’Youville and Rev. Louis Normant du Farandon at Montreal, 1758. Their purpose is to devote themselves to the service of suffering humanity. Foundations have been made at St. Hyasinth, Quebec, and Ottawa which are now independent from the foundation of Montreal, forming distinct branches. The congregation has, in turn, branched from St. Hyasinth, while from Ottawa were founded the Grey Nuns of the Sacred Heart in Philadelphia (q.v.) and the Grey Nuns of the Immaculate Conception at Pembroke, Ont. (1926). These, again, are the mother-houses of numerous establishments. The original community of Montreal has 67 houses, including schools, orphanages, a foundling asylum, hospitals, homes for working girls, and an institution for the blind, in Canada, particularly in the far North, and in the United States. The mother-house is at Montreal; number of religious, 1290.—C.E., VII, 31.

—of the Immaculate Conception, a community founded in St. John, New Brunswick, 1854, by Bp. (later Abp.) Connolly for educational and charitable activities. The institute has 20 houses, including hospitals, orphanages, an infants' home, a house for the aged, and schools, in New Brunswick and the western provinces of Canada. The mother-house is at St. John; the total membership is over 200.—C.E., III, 608.

—of the Incarnate Word, congregation founded at Galveston, Tex., by Bp. Claude Dubuis in 1860, for the education of the young, and the care of the aged, the sick, and orphans. The congregation has 65 houses, including schools, hospitals, and orphanages, in the United States, Mexico, and Ireland. The mother-house is at San Antonio, Tex.; the total number of sisters is 825.

Sisters of Christian Charity, also known as Daughters of the Blessed Virgin Mary of the Immaculate Conception, an institute founded at Paderborn, Germany, 1849, by Pauline von Mallinckrodt, for the instruction of the poor and the care of the blind. The congregation has 114 houses, including schools, academies, colleges, hospitals, an orphanage, and other charitable institutions in the United States, South America, and Europe. The mother-house is at Rome; the total number of religious is 2100.—C.E., III, 711.

SISTERS OF DIVINE PROVIDENCE.

—(Finthen), founded at Finthen, near Mainz, Germany, 1831, by Bp. Wilhelm Emmanuel Freiherr von Ketteler, for the purpose of teaching, and the care of the sick. The mother-house is at Mainz. The sisters have several establishments in the United States.—C.E., V, 52; C.E. Suppl., 265.

—(Lorraine), founded in Lorraine, 1762, by Fr. Jean Martin Moye, for “the propagation of the faith, the ensuring of a Christian education to children, especially those of the rural population, for the care of the sick, and other works of mercy.” Suppressed in 1792, the congregation was reestablished after the Revolution. The American province of the Sisters of Divine Providence of St.-Jean-de-Bassel was founded in 1889, at Covington, Ky., by three sisters of the general mother-house at St.-Jean-de-Bassel, for the Christian education of youth in America. The congregation has 246 houses, including academies, schools, orphanages, and one infant asylum, in France, Belgium, and the United States. Total number of religious in the United States, 379.—C.E., V, 52; C.E. Suppl., 264.

—(San Antonio), founded at Castroville, Texas, 1866, by Sister St. Andrew from the Congregation of the Sisters of Divine Providence of Lorraine, in the request of Bp. Dubuis of Galveston. The mother-house was transferred to San Antonio, 1896. Their primary purpose is teaching. The order has 84 houses, including a house of studies, a college, parochial schools, and academies, all in the United States. The total number of religious is 627.

SISTERS OF PROVIDENCE (St. Mary-of-the-Woods, Indiana), a teaching religious order, founded in France, 1806, by M. Dujaire, Curé of Ruillé-sur-Loir, France, in collaboration with Joséphine du Roscoût, first superior-general. The Indiana community dates from 1840. The primary object of the congregation is the instruction of youth and they were the first American sisterhood to take up work in the foreign missions (1920). The order has 68 houses, including colleges, a normal school, and high schools in the United States, and one school in Kaifeng, China. The mother-house is at St. Mary-of-the-Woods; the total number of religious is 1645.—C.E., XII, 507; C.E. Suppl., 618.

SISTERS OF JOAN OF ARC, founded at Worcester, Mass., 1914, by Fr. Clement Staub. The sisters take care of parish rectories and devote themselves to the service of the clergy and promoting apostleship to the Sacred Heart. The order has 22 houses in Canada, the United States, and France. The mother-house is at Bergerville, near Quebec; religious total 143.—C.E. Suppl., 655.

SISTERS AT LORETTO AT THE FOOT OF THE CROSS, an order founded by Fr. Charles Nerinckx in Kentucky, 1812, for the education of the young. The order has 179 houses, including colleges, academies, and schools (among the latter 3 Indian, 1 Negro, and 1 Chinese), in the United States and China. The mother-house is at Loretto, Ky.; the total number of religious is 843.—C.E., IX, 360.

SISTERS OF MERCY, a congregation of women, founded, 1827, in Dublin, Ireland, by Catherine McAuley, in religion known as Sister Mary Catherine. The Rule of the society is based on that of St. Augustine. The sisters are engaged in the instruction of the ignorant, visitation of the sick and imprisoned, the management of hospitals, orphanages, academies, and schools (among the latter 3 Indian, 1 Negro, and 1 Chinese), in the United States and China. The mother-house is in Dublin. Sisters of St. Joseph.

Congregation of the, founded at Le Puy, France, 1550, by Fr. Jean Paul Madelaine, S. J., assisted by Rt. Rev. Henri de Maupas, a friend and disciple of St. Vincent de Paul, for the Christian education of children. The residence of Mme. de Joux became the cradle of the "Institute." A number of young women, eager for social service in religion, offered themselves and were received by the bishop as the first members of the congregation. The constitutions, drawn up by Bp. de Maupas, are based on the Rules of St. Ignatius; approbation, 1655. The congregation spread over the whole of France, also to Savoy, Italy, and Corsica, with numerous hospitals, schools, and orphan asylums. Dispersed in 1793, their property confiscated, the community was reassembled at Saint Etienne, 1807, by Mother St. John Fontbonne, thence removed to Lyons, from which mother-house foundations have been made in Armenia, Egypt, Corsica, the Indies, Mexico, and the United States; the congregation is now represented in nearly every country of Europe, Asia, and Africa. The sisters were introduced into America, 1836, by the Rt. Rev. Joseph Rosati of the Diocese of St. Louis, Mo. The movement for general government, with a member of the congregation as superior instead of episcopal control, was begun in 1869 and brought to a successful issue, 1877. The Buffalo, Philadelphia, and Brooklyn houses did not change their form of government. In the census of 1925 the Sisters of St. Joseph numbered 10,000 (2500 under a superior-general residing at Carondelet in St. Louis, 7500 under diocesan administration). In Canada, as in the United States, the sisters teach in day and boarding schools, and conduct orphanages, homes, hospitals, and other institutions. For English foundations see Sisters of St. Joseph of Annecy.—C.E., VIII, 511; C.E. Suppl., 657.

The congregation has houses, including colleges, academies, schools, and orphanages, in France, England, Ireland, Spain, Brazil, and the United States. The total number of religious in the United States is 230.

Sisters, Servants of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, founded at Monroe, Mich., 1845, by Fr. Louis Gillet, C.SS.R., for the work of teaching. They were given a Rule founded on that of St. Alphonsus, prepared by Fr. Gilet. The order has 62 schools, including a college and an academy, and an orphanage for girls, all in the states of Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Ohio. The mother-house is at Monroe; total number of religious about 800. In 1856 an independent mother-house was established at Villa Maria, West Chester, Pa. These sisters conduct a college, 5 academies, 52 high schools, 94 parochial schools, 4 nurseries, and 6 high school annexes. The total number of religious is 1358. Another independent mother-house was later founded at Scranton, Pa. The members of this community conduct 1 college, 6 academies, 30 high schools, 60 parochial schools, 1 boys' industrial school, 3 orphan asylums, 1 infant home, 1 nursery, and 1 sodality home. Religious total, 717.—Sisters of the I. H. M., N. Y., 1921.
lague of St. Laurent, near Montreal. These two foundations became independent branches, Indiana in 1869, under the title Sisters of the Holy Cross (q.v.), and Canada in 1883, under the name Sisters of the Holy Cross and of the Seven Dolors (q.v.).

Sisters of the Holy Cross (Notre Dame, Ind.), a branch of the Sisters Marianites of the Holy Cross founded by Fr. Basile Moreau, 1841, at Le Mans, France, to cooperate in the work of the Congregation of the Holy Cross. In 1869 the sisters in the United States were recognized as a distinct congregation. They have 73 houses in the United States, including hospitals, orphanages, schools, and colleges, and 1 mission in Bengal. The mother-house is in Notre Dame, Ind. Professed sisters number about 1200; C.E., VII, 405; C.E. Suppl., 377.

Sisters of the Holy Cross and of the Seven Dolors, a branch of the Sisters Marianites of the Holy Cross founded by Fr. Basile Moreau at Le Mans, France, 1841. The sisters were recognized as a distinct congregation in 1883; their object is the instruction of children. This congregation has 68 houses in Canada and the United States, and one mission in Bengal. The mother-house is at St. Laurent, near Montreal; religious total about 1200.

Sisters of the Holy Faith, founded at Dublin, Ireland, 1857, by Margaret Aylward, under the direction of Fr. John Gowan, C.M., for the care of Catholic orphans. These sisters conduct 16 houses, including infants' schools, junior boys' schools, primary schools, orphanage, and private day schools, all in Ireland.

Sisters of the Holy Family.

—(New Orleans), a congregation of colored sisters following the Rule of St. Augustine, founded in 1842 under the direction of Fr. Etienne Rousse- lon for work among their own race. The order conducts 17 establishments, including schools, homes, and orphanages, in the United States and British Honduras. The mother-house is at New Orleans; the total number of religious is 153.

—(San Francisco), founded in 1872 by Elizabeth Armer under the direction of Fr. Alemany and Fr. Prendergast, for the catechetical instruction of public school children and those of neglectful parents in the organization of sodalities and sewing-classes, and, chiefly, the conducting of day-nurseries. The order has 11 establishments, including day homes and Sunday schools, in San Francisco, Oakland, San José, and Los Angeles. The mother-house is in San Francisco; the total number of religious is 21.

—of Nazareth, founded by Frances Siedliska, in Rome, 1874, for teaching, visiting the sick and poor, and taking charge of hospitals, and orphanages. The sisters also conduct schools, academies, a day nursery, and a house of studies. The mother-house is in Rome; religious total in the United States 1298.

Sisters of the Holy Ghost, a congregation founded by Renée Burel and Marie Balon in Brittany, 1706, primarily for the education of children, but for other charitable works also, including the care of the sick in their own homes. The congregation has 350 houses, including schools, orphanages, homes, hospitals, and day nurseries, in France, Belgium, England, and the United States. The mother-house is at St.-Brieuc; religious total about 2400.—C.E., VII, 417.

Sisters of the Holy Humility of Mary, a religious congregation founded by Mlle. Poitier under the direction of Fr. John J. Begel at Dom­martin-sous-Amance, France, 1853, for the education of poor children. In 1864 the entire community with Fr. Begel came to the United States at the invitation of Bp. Raper of Cleveland, and settled near New Bedford, Pa. The congregation has 34 houses, including academies, schools, hospitals, one orphanage, a home for crippled children, and one for working boys. The mother-house is at Villa Maria, Lawrence Co., Pa.; religious total 378.—C.E., VII, 418.

Sisters of the Holy Names of Jesus and Mary, a religious congregation founded at Lou­gueuil, Quebec, under the patronage of Bp. Bourget of Montreal, 1843, for the Christian education of youth. The order has 188 houses, including schools and normal schools, in Canada and the United States. The mother-house was transferred to Outre­mout, Montreal, in 1925; religious total 2839.—C.E., X, 678.

Sisters of the Immaculate Conception, a division of the Institute of the Holy Family (q.v.), engaged in educational work for all classes of society, and in visiting the sick and poor. They conduct about 25 establishments, including homes of higher education, day and boarding schools, and, chiefly, the conducting of day-nurseries. The order has 186 houses in France, England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, France, Belgium, Spain, South Africa, and Asia; the mother-house is at Bordeaux, the English Novitiate at Rock Ferry (Diocese of Shrewsbury). Juniorates also are attached to some of the convents. The total number of sisters is about 500.—C.E., VII, 681; C.E. Suppl., 378.

Sisters of the Incarnate Word and Blessed Sacrament, a religious order founded by Jeanne Chézard de Matel at Rouen, France, 1652, for the education of youth. The houses are independent of one another. The order has houses in France, the United States, and Mexico.—C.E., VII, 708.

Sisters of the Most Holy Ghost, commonly called Sisters of Providence, organized by Abbé Liwenbruck at Portieux, France, 1831, under the authorization of Antonio Rosmini, founder of the Institute of Charity, whose work they supplement. A house for novices and a training school for sisters was established at Domodossola, Italy. Founded as a contemplative order, the sisters also undertake teaching and various charitable works. The congregation has houses, including schools, in Italy, England, and Wales.

Sisters of the Most Holy Cross and Passion, a second order of Passionist Nuns, founded in Manchester, England, by Fr. Gaudentius Rossi, 1850. The primary purpose of the congregation was to provide homes for girls in the manufacturing towns of England. In 1874 the sisters petitioned to be affiliated with the Congregation of the Passionists and in time became the second and active branch of the Passionist Nuns, receiving final approbation in 1887. The sisters also teach and visit the sick. The congregation has 40 houses, including homes and orphanages, in England, Scotland, Ireland, the United States, Chile, and Argentina. The mother-house is at Bolton, England; the total number of religious is 524.—F. Ward, The Passionists, N. Y., 1923.

SISTERS OF THE MOST HOLY SACRAMENT, a religious congregation established in Louisiana, 1872, primarily for the education of children. Originally a dependent branch of the Benedictine Sisters of Perpetual Adoration founded by Catherine de Bar (in religion Mother Mechtilde of the Blessed Sacrament) in Paris, 1638, the congregation separated from the French province in 1892, later adopting the Rule of St. Augustine. Still later the name of the congregation was changed to the present title. The sisters have 14 houses, including schools, academies, and one house for the aged and infirm. The mother-house is in New Orleans; religious total about 200.

SISTERS OF THE PRECIOUS BLOOD.

Sisters Adorers of the Most Precious Blood (Gurtwell, Baden), founded in 1857 under the direction of Fr. Herman Kessler at Gurtwell, Germany, to care for destitute children and to train religious teachers. Schools and academies were subsequently opened and in 1870 a number of the sisters came to America and were established in what was then the Diocese of Alton (Ill.) and later in the Archdiocese of St. Louis. From the Alton community the O'Fallon and Ruma branches (qq.v.) were founded. The sisters have 10 houses, including schools and one home for the aged, in the Archdiocese of St. Louis and the dioceses of Harrisburg and Fort Wayne. The mother-house is at Columbia, Pa.; religious total 85.—C.E., XII, 375; C.E., Suppl., 602.

Sisters Adorers of the Most Precious Blood (Ruma), a branch of the congregation founded at Gurtwell, Baden, in 1857 under the direction of Fr. Herman Kessler. In America Mother Clementine, mistress of novices, established in 1876 a novitiate in the diocese of Bp. Baltes (Ruma, Ill.). This branch has 67 establishments, including academies, hospitals, an orphanage, a working girls' home, and mission schools, in the Archdiocese of St. Louis, and in the dioceses of Belleville, Goshen, El Paso, Oklahoma, Lincoln, St. Joseph, Springfield (Ill.), and Wichita. The general mother-house is at Rome, the provincial mother-house at Ruma; religious total 447.—C.E., XII, 375.

Sisters Adorers of the Precious Blood, a cloistered contemplative order, founded at St. Hyacinthe, Canada, in 1861 by Aurélie Caoutte, in religion Mother Catherine-Aurélie of the Precious Blood, with the cooperation of Mgr. Joseph La Rocque. The sisters maintain perpetual adoration of the Blessed Sacrament and conduct retreats. The institute subsists on alms and the dowries of choir sisters. Each convent has its own novitiate and is independent in government, but new foundations are made from the mother-house at St. Hyacinthe. The order has 22 houses in Canada, the United States, Cuba, Italy, and China; religious total 507.—C.E., XII, 374.

Sisters of the Most Precious Blood (O'Fallon), established 1875 in St. Charles County, Mo., on completion of St. Mary's Institute as the mother-house and novitiate for members expelled from Germany by the Kulturkampf. and their sisters in America; incorporated under the laws of the State of Missouri, 1878. In 1910 their Rule was revised. The institute has 54 houses, including parochial schools and an academy in the Archdiocese of St. Louis and the dioceses of Lincoln, Omaha, Springfield (Ill.), and St. Joseph; the mother-house is still at O'Fallon. Sisters number approximately 340.—C.E., XII, 375; C.E., Suppl., 602.

Sisters of the Precious Blood (Maria Stein), founded in Grisons, Switzerland, 1833, by Maria Anna Brunner and her son, Rev. Francis de Sales Brunner, with Rule based on that of St. Benedict; revised, 1886. Through the congregation of Priests of the Precious Blood (qq.v.), to which they were affiliated, the sisters were enabled to make a permanent foundation in America at New Riegel, Ohio, and in 1886 they became an independent community. They have been identified as the "Maria Stein" community of Sisters of the Precious Blood from the location, for some years, of their mother-house at Maria Stein, Ohio; the present mother-house is at St. Meinrad, Ind. The sisters conduct 45 establishments, including schools (boarding and day), a sanitarium, orphanages, and a home for the aged, in the Archdiocese of Cincinnati, and the dioceses of Cleveland, Fort Wayne, Kansas City, Monterey-Fresno, St. Joseph, Toledo, and Tucson. The community numbers 635.—C.E., XII, 375; C.E., Suppl., 602.

SISTERS OF THE PRESENTATION OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN MARY, religious congregation founded at Thuyets, France, by Mother Marie Rivier, 1796, for the education of girls. The congregation has houses, including schools and academies, in France, Switzerland, England, Spain, Italy, the Madeira Islands, Canada, and the United States. The mother-house is at Bourg Saint-Andéol, France; religious total in the United States 551.—C.E., XII, 399.

SISTERS OF THE SORROWFUL MOTHER, a community founded for the education of children and the care of the sick; established in America, 1889. They have 32 houses in the United States, schools, hospitals, an orphanage, and a sanitarium, in the United States, Italy, Austria, and Germany. The mother-house is at Rome, the American novitiate at Milwaukee; religious total 630.

SISTERS, SERVANTS OF THE HOLY GHOST OF PERPETUAL ADORATION, a religious congregation founded by Fr. Arnold Janssen at Steyl, the Netherlands, 1896, for the propagation of the Faith and sanctification of the priesthood through the apostleship of prayer. The congregation has 6 houses in the Netherlands, Germany, the United States, and the Philippine Islands. The mother-house is at Steyl; religious total 165.

SISTINE CHAPEL, chapel in the Vatican, built by Sixtus IV, 1473, now used for most of the important papal functions. It is noted no less for its famous choir than for the paintings of Raphael, Michelangelo and others, which adorn its walls and ceiling.

Six Articles, The, articles of faith imposed by a statute of Henry VIII, 1539, which was known as the "Six-stringed Whip," or "Bloody Statute," from the merciless persecutions to which it gave rise; the Articles, composed by Henry without any formal authority from the Church, enforced belief in Transubstantiation, communion in one kind, confession, celibacy of the clergy, vows of chastity, and private Masses.

Sixtus I (Sixtus, the sixth), Saint, Pope (116-125), b. Rome; d. there. Although various dates are given for his pontificate, it is certain that he reigned about ten years. As pope he passed three ordinances: (1) only priests may touch the sacred vessels; (2) bishops returning from the Apostolic See to their dioceses must present Apostolic letters; (2) the priest shall recite the Sanctus with the people during the Mass. Feast, R. Cal., 6 April.—C.E.; Butler.

Sixtus II (Sixtus), Saint, Pope (257-258), martyr; d. Rome. Although, like his predecessors, he upheld the Roman usage of not rebaptizing heretics, he reconciled the Churches of Africa and Asia Minor who were nearing a schism on the subject. He fell under the edict of Valerian which condemned to death all bishops, priests, and deacons; his name occurs in the prayer "Communantes" in the Canon of the Mass. Feast, R. Cal., 6 Aug.—C.E.

Sixtus III (Sixtus), Saint, Pope (432-440), b. Rome; d. there. During his pontificate he was falsely accused of favoring Nestorianism and Pelagianism, because of his conciliatory disposition during their controversies. He approved of the Acts of the Council of Ephesus; defended the supremacy of the pope over Illyricum, against the local bishops and Proclus of Constantinople; restored the Basilica of Liberius; and beautified St. Peter's, and the Lateran Basilica. Feast, 28 March.—C.E.; Butler.

Sixtus IV (Francesco della Rovere), Pope (1471-84), b. Celle, Italy; d. Rome. A Franciscan, he was general of his Order, and cardinal. After his election he interested himself in secular affairs; favored the conspiracy of the Pazzi against the Medici; encouraged the Venetians to attack Ferrara; reformed the Inquisition; opposed the Waldenses; annullcd the decrees of the Council of Constance; built the Sistine Chapel, and the Sistine Bridge across the Tiber; improved sanitary conditions in Rome; and became the second founder of the Vatican Library. During his reign King Christian I of Denmark and Norway was received at Rome.—C.E.; Pastor.

Sixtus V (Felice Peretti), Pope (1585-90), b. Grottamare, Italy; d. Rome. A Friar Minor, he was counsellor to the Holy Office, Bp. of Sant' Agata dei Goti; cardinal. During his pontificate he exterminated the bandits in the Papal States; rearranged the papal finances; fixed the number of cardinals at seventy; and established 15 permanent Congregations. A patron of art, he built the Lateran Palace, completed the Quirinal, enlarged the Sapienza, raised the obelisk of the Vatican, restored the columns of Trajan and Antoninus Pius, and erected the Vatican Library, with its printing office.—C.E.

S.J. = Society of Jesus, or Jesuits.

Skarb Rodziny, a Polish magazine published monthly in Erie, Pa., by the Missionary Fathers of St. Vincent de Paul; founded, 1916; circulation, 10,800.

Skull, emblem in art, symbolic of meditation and of detachment from the world, associated with St. Bruno, St. Jerome, and other hermits and solitaries.

Slander, attributing to another, in his absence, a fault of which one knows him to be innocent. It contains a twofold malice, arising first from the damage unjustly done our neighbor's good name and secondly from the lie. Slander differs from detraction inasmuch as it is the imputing of a misunderstood never committed, while detraction reveals an actual but hidden fault.—C.E.; Slater, Manual of Moral Theology, N. Y., 1908.

Slavery, the subjection of a human being to another as a captive of war, descent from such captive, or by purchase. As an institution it would seem to have existed from the earliest times. Mosiac legislation placed certain limitations on it which were generally observed. Even in pagan Greece and Rome the slave was often treated humanely, never so badly as the slaves under Moslem masters, and never worse than slaves under reputed Christian masters in modern times. As an institution it has now practically disappeared from the earth, though conditions similar to those of slavery prevail in many civilized countries owing to industrial tyranny, especially when women and children are concerned. In the beginning the Church had to recognize slavery as something with which she could not abruptly interfere without creating disorders which would result in anarchy. To have attempted to bring about the release of all the slaves in the Roman Empire would mean throwing on the world millions of human beings without means of support and without any understanding of civic life. It took St. Melania many years to release the slaves on her many estates who numbered over a hundred thousand. The Church, however, succeeded gradually in helping to abolish slavery as a system. There was not in earlier times the same disgrace attached to slavery as in its last days. St. Patrick had been a slave in Ireland before he returned there to Christianize the country. Even in early modern days many a distinguished Catholic priest and layman became a slave to the Moslems in order to ransom some poor captive whose faith was in danger. St. Vincent de Paul spent some time in slavery for this purpose.—C.E. (ed.)

Slavonic Language and Liturgy. Slavonic holds second place, numerically, among the liturgical languages in which the Mass and the Divine Office are said. About 566, Sts. Cyril and Methodius translated the liturgy of the Byzantine Church into old Slavonic, written in the Cyrillic alphabet for the benefit of their Slavic converts. Shortly afterwards, the Roman Mass was translated into Slavonic and written in an older alphabet called Glagolitic. The Greek, or Byzantine, Rite in this ancient language is now used among 15,000,000
Slava, whether Catholic or Orthodox, and the Roman liturgy in Slavonic is still celebrated in Dalmatia and Croatia.—C.E.

Sligo, seaport in Co. Sligo, Ireland, on the Garvogue River, containing the ruins of a Dominican abbey, the cathedral for the diocese of Elphin, and the College of the Immaculate Conception. In early times it was a walled town with a castle for protection (1249). In 1641 it was taken by the Parliamentary forces, and afterwards occupied by the Royalists.

Slime of the Earth, term used in Holy Scripture in the sense of the material of which man’s body is formed, found in the Reims-Douay Version (Gen., 2; Tob., 8). In Tobias it is the translation of a Latin variant, not found in the ancient texts. The Latin Vulgate renders the Hebrew ‘aphar (Gen., 2) as limus; the Reims-Douay Version follows the Vulgate. This is evidently an error of translation; the meaning of ‘aphar is dust, and it is thus rendered in all the subsequent places of the Reims-Douay version.

Sloumie, Charles William, LL.B., LL.D. (1850-1929), lawyer, b. New York; d. Long Island. Educated at St. Francis Xavier’s College, and Columbia Law School, he was admitted to the New York Bar in 1871. He was a member of the Board of Directors of the Catholic Encyclopedia, member and former president of St. Francis Xavier Alumni Association, member and former vice-president of the U.S. Catholic Historical Society, member of the Bar Association of the city of New York. He wrote a “Treatise on the Law of Landlord and Tenant” (N. Y., 1884), and was a frequent contributor to law journals and historical magazines. He was a nephew of Charles O’Conor, the famous lawyer and candidate for the Presidency.

Sloth, one of the seven capital sins; sluggishness of the soul in the exercise of virtue, because the practise of virtue requires sacrifice. It denotes a sadness or dejection concerning the Divine friendship, since this must be preserved by the laborious practise of virtue, also an indolent shunning of life.—C.E.

Slovensky Svět, a weekly newspaper published in the Slovak language in Pittsburgh, Pa., by the Catholic American Publishing Co.; founded, 1927; circulation, 9681.

S.M. = Society of Mary; or sancta memoria (of holy memory).

Smalkaldic League, political and religious alliance in 1531, at Smalkalden, in Hesse, among Protestant princes, after Emperor Charles V had ordered all the rulers of the empire who had embraced the Reformation to restore the ecclesiastical properties they had seized from the Catholics. The League included six German princes, among them the notorious Philip of Hesse and the Elector John of Saxony; and eleven cities, including Strasbourg, Constance, and Bremen. The alliance of foreign powers was solicited, and that of France was obtained in 1532. Confident of the League’s support, Protestant princes continued to suppress Catholic bishoprics and to confiscate Church properties. In self-defense a Catholic League was formed at Nuremberg in 1538. Dissolved after the defeat of Mühlberg (1547), the Smalkaldic League was restored after Charles V was obliged to sign the Treaty of Passau (1552), favorable to the rebels. The next step was the Peace of Augsburg (1555), which marked the triumph of Protestantism in Germany.—C.E.; Janssen, tr. Christie, History of the German People, V, St. L., 1903. (F. P. D.)

Smith, James (1790-1866), pioneer of Catholic journalism in Scotland, b. Skolland, Shetland Isles; d. London. He was a solicitor to the Supreme Court in Edinburgh, but after his conversion he devoted himself to literature; founded and edited the “Edinburgh Catholic Magazine,” and the “Catholic Directory for England;” edited the “Dublin Review” for a short time, and was the author of several articles defending Catholic doctrine.—C.E.

Smyrna, city in Asia Minor, on the gulf of the same name. One of the seven churches in Asia, to whose bishop St. John was commanded to write an epistle (Apoc., 1).

Sobieski, John (1629-96), Polish soldier, b. Oleśko, Galicia; d. Willanow. He fought in the great Cossack rebellion (1648), accompanied Czarniecki’s expedition to Denmark, and fought the Muscovites at Cudnov. As commander-in-chief, he beat the Turks at Chocim and Lemberg. His greatest exploit was the rescue of Vienna besieged by the Turks and their expulsion from Poland and Hungary. Forced to give up Kieff to Russia and to see the crown pass from his family, he died, a broken man.—C.E.

Social Contract, the title of a book on the theory of the state written by Jean Jacques Rousseau in 1762. The problem Rousseau is seeking to solve is: “To find that form of association which should protect and defend, with the whole force of the community, the person and property of each individual; and in which each person, by uniting himself to the rest, shall nevertheless be obedient only to himself, and remain as fully at liberty as before” (Social Contract, Bk. I, Chap. 6). The solution he offers is the organization of the state by means of a social contract which, stripped of unessential, he reduces to the following terms: “We, the contracting parties, do jointly and severally submit our persons and abilities to the supreme direction of the general will of all; and in a collective body receive each member into that body as an indivisible part of the whole” (ibid.).

Rousseau recognizes the family as the most ancient society, and even as a natural society during the period of the dependency of the offspring (Chap. 2). This is the state of nature. But a time arrives when mankind can no longer maintain itself in that stage; thereupon the organization of the state through the social contract becomes imperative. Man cannot create new powers but only form an accumulation of existing ones; and this he does by contributing his force and liberties to make up the general will. In passing from the state of nature to society man ceases to follow instinct and appetite as his rule of conduct, and accepts justice as the rule instead (Chap. 8). The general will set up by the social contract is sovereign in society, and its sovereignty is inalienable, indivisible, and always in the right because it constantly tends towards the general good (Bk. II, Chap. 1, 2). A law is the exercise of the activity of the general will, and as the general will is always right, the law cannot be unjust. It is admitted, however, that the general will may be insufficiently informed, and hence the need of the legislator who will bring about a union of understanding and will in the body politic. Rousseau recognizes the conventional forms of government and further holds that, "every form of government is not equally proper to every country" (Bk. III, Chap. 8), but, "that government is the best under which the citizens increase and multiply most" (Chap. 9). In establishing a government, the sovereign, i.e., the general will, enacts that a government should be established in such or such a form, and the people nominate the chiefs who are to administer it (Chap. 17). The outstanding weakness of Rousseau's theory is that it does not afford any basis for right. If the individual will in the state of nature has only instinct and appetite for its rule of conduct, the mere aggregation of individual wills to make the general will cannot transform instinct and appetite into the voice of duty.—C.E., IV, 335.

Socialism, a social-economic system based on the common ownership of the means of production and exchange of wealth. The name is supposed to have originated in England in 1835 during the agitation of Robert Owen. The idea of common ownership as a remedy for the inequalities of life appears in Plato's "Republic," Campanella's "City of the Sun," and other writings of ancient and modern times. The philosophic basis for common ownership as a serious policy of social management was provided by Karl Marx (1818-83) in his economic determinism as, or as it is often called, the materialistic interpretation of history. Marx's socialism is therefore called scientific. It is the inspiration of all socialism that is taken seriously in modern times, although in the stress of controversy socialists have abandoned most of the Marxian principles. The contributions made by Marx to socialism are: "The Communist Manifesto" (in collaboration with Engels), published, 1848, and containing the germs of his theory; "Das Kapital," the first part of which appeared in 1867; and the founding of the International Workingmen's Association in 1864. This "International" provided the means for the spread of his ideas, while "Das Kapital" provided the philosophy of the movement. The strength of socialism has lain rather in the criticism of existing capitalism than in the appeal of its own program of social amelioration. In its original program socialism was revolutionary rather than par-}

Society (Lat., socius, a companion), a stable union of men cooperating for the attainment of some end beneficial to all. It is distinguished from any grouping of animals (herds, flocks, swarms) in that it presupposes intelligent and free activities; from temporary groups of men (mobs, crowds) in that it presupposes some permanence and organization of membership; and from other human groupings in which the members remain entirely individualistic in their acts and purposes. A necessary factor in every society is the presence of authority, whereby the acts of the individuals are properly directed and subordinated to the purposes of the society. Authority requires the distinction of rulers and subjects, the former regulating and the latter being regulated in the exercise of authority. The first and basic society is the family (q.v.), in which husband, wife, and children find the fulness of life which their complementary natures require. Historically and logically this gives rise to the second primary society, the state in which temporal interests are secured which the unassociated individual would not normally be able to attain. The Church is a perfect society, promoting the welfare of the individual soul, and fulfilling the social duty of worship.

Within and beyond these universal and basic societies are other secondary organizations, as numerous as man's needs and the various ways he has found to satisfy these needs. They are distinguished by their purposes, e.g., education, recreation, business, or politics, etc.; their method of organization, e.g., oligarchies, democracies, etc.; their territorial limitations, as Utah or Ohio; or by any other distinctive features.

The origin and development of societies have been much studied in connection with the theory of evolution. Various factors have been invoked to explain social formations, geographical, racial, legalistic, etc. It is beyond question that all forms of society, including family, church, and state, have been profoundly modified by geographic locale, economic interests, racial and social inheritance. No one factor will explain all changes, nor is it true that change has always been progress. A complete theory must include all factors, from the innate factors for the origin of society, and the rational appreciation of the nature and benefits of organization. In face of all modern attacks, the classic theory of the nature and workings of societies remains secure.—C.E.; Woods, First Book in Ethics, N. Y., 1923.

Society of Jesus (Company of Jesus; Jesuits) ranks among religious orders as a body of clerics regular organized for Apostolic work, fol-follow a religious rule and relying on alms for their support. Founded at Montmartre, Paris, 1554, by St. Ignatius Loyola (q.v.), it was the chief instrument of the Catholic Reformation. Paul III approved the new rule, 1540, and Ignatius was elected the first general, 1541. The constitutions drafted by him and based on his Spiritual Exercises, were adopted, 1558. It was the first order which enjoined by its constitutions devotion to the cause of education. The ministry of the Society consists chiefly in preaching; teaching catechism; administering the sacraments; conducting missions in parishes; taking care of parishes; organizing pious confraternities; teaching in schools of every grade; writing books, pamphlets, periodical articles; going on foreign missions among uncivilized peoples, and special missions when ordered by the pope. The general resides at Rome and has a council of assistants. The motto of the Society is “Ad Majorem Dei Gloriam” (For the greater glory of God).

While the preachers and missionaries evangelized Italy, colleges were established at Padua, Venice, Naples, Bologna, Florence, Parma, and other cities.

After 1544 their success in Spain was rapid and the province established, 1547, was subdivided into three, 1554. In France many colleges were founded beginning with the Collège de Clermont, 1550. Under Henry IV the Society increased rapidly. The politico-religious history of the Society under Louis XIV centers round Jansenism (q.v.) and the lives of the king's confessors, especially PP. Annat, Ferrier, La Chaise, and Michel Le Tellier. The cause of the Jesuits was also compromised by the various quarrels of Louis XIV with Innocent XI, especially concerning the régale and the Gallican Articles of 1682. The first Jesuit to labor in Germany was Bl. Peter Faber (q.v.) who won to the ranks St. Peter Canisius (q.v.). The first residence was in Cologne, 1544, the first college at Vienna, 1552. Hungary was included in the province of Austria; the chief patron of the order was Cardinal Peter Pazmany, Canisius visited Poland, 1558, and animated King Sigismund to an energetic defense of Catholicism. The colleges of Braunsberg (1594) and Vilna (1569) became centers of Catholic activity in northeastern Europe. In 1608 the province was subdivided into Lithuania and Poland. The first settlement in Belgium was at Louvain, 1542; Flanders became a separate province, 1564. Jesuit congregations, or sodalities of the Blessed Virgin were first instituted at Rome by a Belgian Jesuit, Jean Leoniis, 1563, and were taken up enthusiastically by his native country. The Society had great difficulty in finding an entrance into England, but early Jesuits exerted themselves on behalf of the English seminary at Douai and of the refugees at Louvain, and took charge of many colleges on the continent, Valladolid, St. Omer, and Seville. Their period of greatest prosperity was under King James II (1685-88). Ireland was first visited, 1542, but immense difficulties had to be overcome. Many Irish colleges were founded on the continent. The greatest extension in Ireland was naturally during the dominance of the Confederation (1642-54). Missionary labor was the chief occupation of the Irish Jesuits. The Scottish mission may be said to have begun with Father James Gordon, 1584, and Fathers Edmund Hay and John Drury who came in 1585. They also conducted colleges on the continent. After the Revolution the Fathers were scattered but returned with reduced numbers.

The field of foreign missions is held in greatest esteem among the Jesuits. St. Francis Xavier (q.v.) went to India (Goa), 1542, to Ceylon; Malacca, 1545; Japan, 1549. Missions on the west coast of Africa were organized from Goa. Others were founded in Abyssinia; Persia; Japan, which gradually developed into a separate province; China; Central and South America; Paraguay; Mexico; United States under Fr. Andrew White (q.v.), and four other Jesuits from the English mission (1634), where they worked among the Indians. The French Missions had as bases the French colonies in Canada, the Antilles, Guiana, and India and missions of the Levant, in Syria, among the Maronites (q.v.), etc. The Canadian mission is described under Canada; and Missions, Catholic Indian, of Canada.

In 1773 Pope Clement XIV issued the Brief of suppression by which the entire Jesuit order was suppressed throughout Christendom. He had been under pressure of the Spanish Court and the Due de Choiseul and other strong influences. In the separate countries (Portugal, France, Spain) the Jesuits had been already expelled some years before. The suppression was due to the same causes which in further development brought about the French Revolution. Empress Catherine of Russia and Frederick II of Prussia opposed this measure and maintained the Society as a teaching body, so that the Society was never wholly suppressed. During most of the time of the suppression the only priests in the United States were Jesuits. Pius VII restored the Society by Brief, 1814. General statistics of the Society of Jesus for the beginning of 1929: priests, 9517; scholastics, 6591; brothers, 4528: in all, 20,636. Statistics for English-speaking countries are as follows:

Society of Jesus

The Society of Jesus, or the Jesuits, was established in London in July, 1534, by six Jesuits, with the permission of Pope Paul III, and in his constant endeavor to establish the peace of Christ among the nations. It also aims at developing the spirit of devotion, and prayer for the Holy See. By assisting in the organization of pilgrimages to Rome, and public functions in honor of the sovereign pontiff, it contributes to the upholding of the moral prestige of the papacy. By means of leaflets, tracts, and posters it endeavors to foster among the faithful the teaching of the Holy Father as set forth in his encyclical letters and addresses delivered on special occasions. The S.M.A.S. thus makes it possible for the faithful to take a personal share in the work of apostolate of the Holy Father by prayer, work, and charitable offerings. The annual contribution of the members and their voluntary donations are used to cover the expenses of the publicity and propaganda and to increase the income of the Holy Father derived from Peter's Pence. In addition to a membership (in 1929) of over 7000, the S.M.A.S. also enjoys the support of 21 other Catholic organizations.

Society of Foreign Missions of Milan (E.V.W.), founded, 1850, under the patronage of Pope Pius IX by Angelo Ramazzotti, then an Oblate Father of S. Rho (Milan), later Bp. of Pavia, and subsequently Patriarch of Venice. The society is a "Pious Association of Secular Priests," who labor as missionaries among the heathen in India, China, and Burma. They follow a rule approved by the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda; mother-house at Milan. The society has apostolic schools at Monza, Genoa, and Aversa, and missions in the dioceses of Hyderabad-Decan and Krishnagar, the vicariates apostolic of Hanchangfou, Hong-Kong, Kaifeng-fou, Nan-yang, T'ung-gou, and Weihou-fou, and the Prefecture Apostolic of Kengtung. Statistics: 1092 missionaries, both home and foreign, 1092 missionaries (of whom 46 are bishops), 1414 native priests.

Society of Foreign Missions of Paris (missions étrangères de Paris), a congregation based on the plans of Alexandre de Rhodes as represented to Innocent X, 1653. His exposition of the needs of missions in the Far East, where he had labored since 1624, enlisted the pope's cooperation and he was commissioned to select priests who could be consecrated bishops for missionary jurisdiction. Through the papal nuncio at Paris the choice fell on three zealous priests, but their departure was retarded by the hostile attitude of Portugal, which feared the spread of French influence. Negotiations were resumed in 1657, and a complete program of colonization was based on the Decree of Propaganda of 1651. The project, coming under the immediate protection of Pope Alexander VII, was furthered by the untiring efforts of Mgr. Palli, Bp. of Heliopolis, and Mgr. Motte-Lambert, Bp. of Beirut, whose nominations as vicars Apostolic were confirmed by Propaganda, 1658. The foundation of a seminary as the center of the society was prescribed by Propaganda, and one was constituted, 1660; the society was approved, 1890; the Constitutions revised and approved by Propaganda, 1923. The society at its inception was promoted by generous donations and the devoted interest of men and women prominent in French affairs. It progressed with difficulties, however, through the 17th and 18th centuries and was temporarily arrested by the French Revolution; but since 1843, it has flourished with steadily increasing membership, partly through contributing charities and in great measure through the inspiring martyrlogy the society boasts. The persecution of its missionaries even roused European intervention in Eastern countries. Another cause of progress has been the comparatively recent facilitation of communication. The society is, not, strictly speaking, a religious order, but an association of secular priests bound by community of object, i.e., the service of the missions. Membership is eligible only to those who have already spent three years in the mission field. The superior of the Seminary in Paris is, unofficially, the superior-general, governing with a board of directors representative of each mission group. The bishops and vicars Apostolic, nominated by the missionaries, are appointed by the pope, depending on him solely through Propaganda. Statistics: 37 missions, 1692 missionaries (of whom 46 are bishops), 1414 native priests.

Society of Marie Réparatrice, founded by Emilie d'Oultremont, Baroness d'Hoogvorst, in Strasburg, Alsace, 1857. The purpose of the society is reparation for sin by a mixed life of contemplation and works for the spiritual good of others. The order has more than 60 houses, including houses of retreat, schools, lending libraries, study clubs, workrooms for the poor, orphanages, and dispensaries, in Italy, France, Belgium, Spain, England, Ireland, Canada, Africa, the United States, Cuba, and Palestine. The mother-house is in Rome; religious total about 2000.

Society of Mary (Marist Fathers), religious order of priests and lay-brothers founded at Lyons in 1816 by Jean Claude Colin, approved by Gregory XVI, 1836. The work of the order includes missions, both domestic and foreign, colleges for the education of youth, and seminaries for the training of clerics. In France the Marists developed rapidly, and outside of France the first field of labor offered them was the Vicariate Apostolic of Western Oceania. The immense area of the vicariate, together with the presence at its head of a secular bishop, soon necessitated the creation of smaller vicariates under Marist bishops. These missions have progressed steadily under the Marist fathers who, besides their religious work, have largely contributed to make known the languages, fauna and flora of the South Sea Islands, and helped in their colonization. In the British Isles the Marist foundations began in 1850 at the request of Card. Wiseman. The Society of Mary has taken a firm hold in the United States and even extended into Mexico. Rome is the seat of the mother-house and the procurator-general. Statistics: 7 provinces, numerous missions in Oceania, 1136 religious.
Society of Mary, of Paris (MARIANISTS), religious order founded at Bordeaux, France, in 1817, by Guillaume Joseph Chalminade. The constitutions of this society specify the salvation of its own members as its primary end; its secondary end includes all works of zeal. Christian education especially appeals to its members, who have devoted most of their energies to the management of schools. The general superior and his assistants resided at Bordeaux until 1800, when they removed to Paris, where the headquarters of the order were maintained until the expulsion of the society from France, 1903. Since then the seat of the general administration has been at Nivelles, Belgium. The order spread rapidly, establishing houses in France, Belgium, Germany, Austria, Switzerland, Italy, Spain, Africa, China, Japan, Hawaiian Islands, Canada, Mexico, and the United States. Statistics: 190 houses, 1900 religious.

Society of Missionary Catechists, an organization designed to meet the needs of the vast mission territories of the Southwest of the United States where priests are few. In these districts the Missionary Catechists prepare the children for the reception of the sacraments, visit the poor and sick in their homes, clothe, and care for the destitute, train altar boys, and cooperate with the heavily-burdened missionary priests in every way.

Society of Our Lady of Good Counsel, the, is composed principally of London solicitors and barristers; its purpose is to render free legal help and advice to the poor. It is placed under the patronage of Bl. Thomas More, lord high chancellor of England. Until this society was constituted, 25 April, 1926, there was no means in Great Britain whereby a poor person could obtain legal assistance, excepting only advice, in regard to police court and county court cases, and it is in these courts that most cases of immediate personal concern to the poor are tried. A “poor person” according to the rules of this society is one not possessed of £50 (excluding wearing apparel, tools of trade, and the subject matter of the proceedings) and whose total income does not exceed £2 per week. Although essentially a Catholic society, the question of religion does not arise so far as applicants for help are concerned; assistance is freely given to all regardless of creed, social status, or character; it is only necessary that clients be poor and have right and justice on their side. Each solicitor and barrister on joining the society agrees to take certain classes of cases; he may thus choose the division of law with which he is most familiar. The general welfare of the society is the concern of a council which is composed of ecclesiastics, lawyers, and laymen, the Card.-Abp. of Westminster being president. The activities of the society are directed by an executive of lawyers of both legal branches, the chairman being Sir Reynold Mitchell Banks. Attached to the society is a Ladies Committee which undertakes to collect funds for such necessary expenses as office rent, court fees, etc., and to make known to the poor in need of legal aid the help they may obtain from the society; a special sub-committee acts as a link between the society and foreign embassies, legations, and consulates, who may have poor of their nationalities seeking aid. While it is no part of the society’s work to foster litigation, its aim being rather to induce just and equitable settlement of disputes at the minimum cost to the clients as far as the Court of Criminal Appeal, in which tribunal, as elsewhere, it has achieved notable successes. (F. V. W.)

Society of Our Lady of the Retreat in the Cenacle, founded, 1826, at La Louvise, France, by Marie Victoire Thérèse Condere, under the direction of Fr. Jean Pierre Tessier. Their work consists chiefly of providing spiritual retreats and teaching Christian doctrine. The society has 35 houses of retreats in Belgium, England, France, the Netherlands, Italy, Switzerland, Brazil, and the United States. The mother-house is at Brussels; the total number of religious is 1000.—C.E., III, 518.

Society of Priests of St. Sulpice (SULPICIANS), founded at Paris, 1642, by Jean Jacques Olier, for the purpose of providing directors for the seminaries established by him. Alexander Le Ragois de Bretonvilliers, the successor of Olier (1657-70), drew up the constitution of the society and secured its approval. The object of the society was to labor, in direct dependence on the bishops, for the education and perfection of ecclesiastics. During the 18th century the society carried on its work amid the difficulties aroused by Jansenism and philosophism. In the 19th century it continued its work of clerical training while sharing all the vicissitudes of the Church in France. Attacked during the persecutions brought about by the separation of Church and State, the society lost the old seminary of Paris, yet it was not dissolved and continues to subsist.

Olier in union with several pious persons, among them Jerome Le Royer de la Dauversière, founded the Society of Notre-Dame de Montréal. The object of this undertaking was to found a city in honor of the Blessed Virgin, as headquarters for the Indian missions and as a stronghold against the Iroquois. In 1657 four of Olier’s disciples went to the mission of Villemarie and in 1663 the associates of Notre Dame ceded their rights and duties to the Society of Saint-Sulpice, which was thenceforth owner of the Island of Montreal. At the end of the 17th century the Sulpicians had opened in the vicinity of Montreal six parishes which they administered and supplied with churches, presbyteries, and schools. In 1684 three Sulpicians attempted to found a mission in Texas, but they failed, and one of their number, Fr. Chefdeville was martyred by the Indians. During the 18th century the number of priests increased and new foundations were made throughout Canada.

The Sulpicians came to the United States upon the institution of the American hierarchy. In 1791 four Sulpicians arrived in Baltimore, purchased a house on the edge of the city and began St. Mary’s Seminary. The following year their number was augmented but it was still too early for a seminary and the priests ministered in the churches of Baltimore and the missions of the country. Under Fr. Tessier (1810-29), the seminary became solidly established and, 1822, it was endowed by Pius VII with all the privileges of a Catholic university. Six
SOCIETY OF PRIESTS

Society of St. Edmund, founded under the name "Oblates of the Sacred Heart of Jesus and Immaculate Heart of Mary, Missionaries of St. Edmund," at Pontigny, France, 1843, by Fr. Jean Baptiste Muard for the work of missions. The members devote themselves to parochial, educational work, to the direction of pious associations, and to foreign missions. The motherhouse, originally at Pontigny, after the spoliation laws in France was transferred to Hitchens, England, where the fathers administered St. Michael's College until 1925 when the Augustinians of the Assumption replaced them. Formerly, the Congregation had also possession of the Abbey of Mont-St. Michel, and colleges at Laval, Château Gontier, and Sens. For a time they directed the Indian mission of St. Labre in the Diocese of Great Falls, Mont.; the Society is now represented in the Diocese of Burlington, Vt., conducting an Apostolic School and Novitiate at Swanton, and St. Michael's College at Winooski Park. Statistics (for the United States): 15 Fathers; 12 lay brothers; 16 scholastics and novices; 11 postulants; 145 students.—C.E., Suppl., 275.

Society of St. Francis de Sales (Salesians or Don Bosco), founded for the Christian education of the young by Blessed John Don Bosco near Turin, Italy, 1844. To combat the atheistic philosophy disseminated by the French Revolution, Don Bosco gathered together young boys, especially for the poor, who received religious instruction at what were called "Festive Oratories." The institution of night-schools became necessary and a trained staff was formed. The work of education was divided into two classes, students and artisans, the second enabling boys to learn a trade. The work was perpetuated by the formation of a religious congregation under rules drawn up in 1857 and approved, 1859; Rule and Constitutions were definitely approved by Pius IX, 1874. Development was rapid; colleges were opened, and missionaries were sent to South America, 1875, Africa, 1889, and Asia, 1894-1911. They came to the United States, 1889. Statistics: 35 provinces, 543 houses (276 in Europe, 211 in America, 34 in Asia, 19 in Africa, 3 in Australia; 28 are missions); 6882 religious including novices (2290 clerks, 1737 postulants; 422 missionaries).—C.E., XIII, 398.

SOCIETY OF ATONEMENT

Society of St. Vincent de Paul, an international society of Catholic laymen established for the purpose of performing deeds of charity, particularly visiting the poor in their homes and relieving their material wants and spiritual needs. The work is carried on almost exclusively by volunteers. The society was founded May, 1833, in Paris by six students, the leading spirit of whom was Frédéric Ozanam and in a short time had spread throughout the world. Its members number over 130,000 who are classed as "active" or "honorary" according as they attend the weekly meetings or "conferences" and participate actively in the organization's charitable work, or as they lend their support by spiritual and monetary offerings. The General Council of Paris has jurisdiction over the entire society which is divided into national superior councils, central councils, which govern diocesan councils, which in turn rule over the particular councils and parish conferences of a city. The official organ of the society is the "Manuel de la Société de Saint Vincent de Paul." The society was established in the United States in 1845, the first branch being organized in New York City. In 1849 it was organized into a body with a superior council at Washington and is now represented in dioceses throughout the country. It exists in a flourishing condition in England where it has its superior council in London, and in Ireland where the head council is in Dublin. The society has orphan asylums, immigrant aid societies, fresh-air nurseries, industrial schools, hospitals, etc., under its patronage. There exists also an international woman's society of St. Vincent de Paul with the same aim and organization as the men's. It was founded at Bologna, 1856, and has headquarters there.

Friars of the Atonement, a branch of the Third Order Regular of St. Francis, founded in the United States, 1889, by Paul James Francis, a clergyman of the Episcopal Church. They established the Church Unity Octave, 1908, and in 1909 were received corporately into the Catholic Church. Among the society's activities are the Union that Nothing be Lost, which dispenses large sums to the missions, and "The Lamp," a monthly publication. The headquarters and novitiate (St. John's Atonement House) are at Graymoor, N. Y.; there is a foundation at Hereford, Tex.

Franciscan Sisters of the Atonement, the second congregation of the Society of the Atonement, founded at Graymoor, N. Y., in 1898, by Mother Lurana Mary Francis. They observe the Rule given by Leo X to the Third Order Regular, being affiliated to the Friars Minor by an Indult of 1921. Their aim is the "reunion of all Christians," and their work is that of a missionary character both at home and in the foreign mission field. The order has 15 houses, including mission settlements, a clinic dispensary for colored people, a summer camp, and other establishments, in the United States, Canada, Italy, and Ireland. The motherhouse is at Graymoor; religious total 115. Tra-
SOCIETY OF ATONEMENT

Society of the Blessed Sacrament, congregation of priests founded at Paris, 1865, by Blessed Pierre Julien Eymard, to devote themselves exclusively to the worship of the Holy Eucharist. In the houses of these Fathers, the Blessed Sacrament is always exposed for adoration, and the sanctuary never without adorers. All the houses in France were closed by the government in 1900, but Perpetual Adoration is continued in the Blessed Sacrament chapel in Paris. The first foundation in the United States was made in 1900, by Fr. Etevenon at St. Jean Baptiste church, N.Y.C.; in 1904 the fathers opened a preparatory seminary at Suffern, Rockland Co., N.Y., and they are now represented in the archdioceses of New York and Chicago. The general mother-house is at Rome; the novitiate for North America at Quebec, Canada. From every house of the congregation emanates a series of Eucharistic works, as: “Eucharistic Weeks, or, Lights and Flowers,” “People’s Eucharistic League,” “Priests’ Eucharistic League,” “Sacerdotal Eucharistic League,” etc. In the United States these Fathers publish “Emmanuel,” and “The Sentinel of the Blessed Sacrament.” Statistics: 500 religious, 25 houses, of which 3 are in Canada, 3 in the United States, and 2 in South America.

Society of the Divine Saviour (Salvatorians), founded, under the title Society of Catholic Instruction, by Fr. John Baptist Jordan, at Rome, 1881; first papal approbation, 1905; final approbation, 1911. The rules and constitutions, based largely on those of the Society of Jesus, add to the usual three vows a fourth of apostolic mission work. The society’s aim is to spread God’s kingdom on earth, by means of parish and social work and the advancement of Catholic literature, which they issue in large quantities. The congregation has been assigned a new mission field in the province of Fu-kien, China, to replace the Prefecture Apostolic of Assam, British India, transferred since the World War to the Salesians. The mother-house is in Rome; the other houses are in Germany, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Rumania, Switzerland, Belgium, England, the United States, Colombia, and Brazil. Statistics: 4 provinces; 32 houses and colleges; about 500 members, of whom 200 are priests.—C.E., V, 53; C.E. Suppl., 206.

—Sisters of the Divine Saviour, a congregation founded in Rome, 1888, by Fr. John Baptist Jordan to supplement the work of the Salvatorian Fathers. They follow the Third Rule of St. Francis and their aim is religious enlightenment. The congregation has 65 houses, including schools, homes for aged women, industrial schools for women; they nurse the sick in hospitals and in their own homes. The mother-house is in Rome; they are established in Italy, Germany, Austria, Hungary, Belgium, and China; the total number of religious is 1000.—C.E. Suppl., 206.

Society of the Divine Word, founded, 1875, at Steyl, near Tegelen, Holland, by Fr. Arnold Jansen, for the propagation of the Catholic religion among pagan nations. It is composed of priests and lay brothers. The founder did not intend originally to create a congregation; he wished a simple association without vows, but in 1885 the vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience, were adopted. The Society has houses in Europe, and missions in China, Oceania, Africa, and America. Its missionaries study carefully the racial and social traits and customs of the peoples whom they seek to civilize and Christianize, and they have made notable contributions to the science of ethnology and comparative religion. Besides other publications, “Anthropos,” published by them, is a leading anthropological journal containing articles in various languages.—C.E., V, 54.

Society of the Helpers of the Holy Souls, founded in Paris, 1856, by Eugénie Smet, to assist the Holy Souls, to visit and care for the sick poor, and for other charitable works. The Rule of St. Ignatius is followed. Shortly after their institution, the Helpers created “honorary members,” “associates,” and “benefactors,” who join them in prayer and sacrifice and enjoy the privileges of the Society. Priests become honorary members by celebrating a monthly Mass for the intentions of the community; and religious, by receiving a monthly Communion for these intentions. The Society has 50 convents, including schools, orphanages, and settlement houses, in the United States, England, Scotland, France, Belgium, Italy, and China. The mother-house is at Paris. The total number of religious is 1300.—C.E., VII, 213.

Society of the Holy Child Jesus, founded in England, 1846, by Mrs. Cornelia Connelly, primarily for the education of girls; their work includes the visiting of the sick and poor and instruction of converts, when it does not interfere with their teaching. The constitutions are based on those of St. Ignatius. The society has 26 houses including schools, academies, and one college in England, France, Switzerland, Italy, and the United States. The mother-house is in Rome; the total number of religious is about 540.—C.E., VII, 400.

Society of the Holy Name, established, 1274, by John of Vercelli, who commanded the superiors of the Dominican order to preach devotion to the Holy Name, in obedience to Pope Gregory’s wishes. Two centuries later Didacus of Victoria wrote the rules and constitution of the Society; Pius IV raised it to a confraternity; Pius V restricted canonical erection of the Holy Name Society to the Dominicans, 1571, and since then, charters must be obtained from the Master General of the Dominican Order. The primary object of the Holy Name Society is to honor and reverence the Holy Name of God and of Jesus Christ; this is accomplished by directing the members to practise of piety, to frequent prayer and to group action in worship. The members promise to honor and reverence the Holy Name, to abstain from blasphemy, unclean speech, and perjury, and to receive Holy Communion at least quarterly in a body. The United States with its territories and dependencies and English-speaking Canada have 6570 societies and 2,429,550 members. In many cities there are special branches for men of the same avocation, especially... among police and firemen and postoffice employees. The organ of the Society is the Holy Name Journal.—C.E., VII, 490.

Society of the Priests of Mercy of the Immaculate Conception, founded at Lyons, France, in 1808, by Rev. Jean Baptiste Rauzan; dispersed by Napoleon I; reconstituted at Paris, 1814, under the title "Priests of the Missions of France"; again dispersed, 1830; reestablished as a new society of "Fathers of Mercy," approved and affiliated to Propaganda, 1834; Constitutions approved, 1908. The Fathers embrace all works of apostolic zeal as auxiliaries of the secular clergy under episcopal jurisdiction. They conduct missions and have charge of both French- and English-speaking parishes in America. The mode of life is, in general, that of secular priests. The Society is now established in France, Italy, Belgium, and the United States; the mother-house is at Paris. A procure and House of Studies is at Rome; St. Joseph's Novitiate is at Oregon, near Peekskill, N. Y. Statistics (for the United States): 5 churches, in New York and Brooklyn; 1 apostolic school; 1 novitiate of the province; 20 Fathers.—C.E., V, 794; C.E. Suppl., 495.

Society of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, founded in Paris, 1800, by St. Madeleine Sophie Barat, for the education of youth and the giving of retreats. The Rule is based on that of St. Ignatius. The society has 153 houses, including colleges, academies, elementary and high schools, in Italy, France, Belgium, England, Ireland, Scotland, the Netherlands, Spain, Germany, Austria, Hungary, Poland, the United States, Canada, Cuba, Porto Rico, Mexico, Peru, Chile, Argentina, Uruguay, Brazil, Colombia, Egypt, Congo, Australia, New Zealand, Japan, and China. The mother-house is in Rome; religious total 6750.—C.E.; J. Stuart, The Society of the Sacred Heart, Lond., 1923.

Society of the Sisters, Faithful Companions of Jesus, an institute founded by the Visecountess d'Houet, at Amiens, France, 1820, for the education of all classes. The society has 95 houses, including schools, a normal training college, one orphanage, and hostels for university students, in France, Italy, Switzerland, Belgium, England, Ireland, Scotland, the Channel Islands, Australia, Canada, and the United States. The mother-house is in Paris; the total number of religious is about 1300.—C.E., V, 769.

Socinianism, the body of doctrine held by the followers of Lelio Sozzini, or Socinus (1535-62), a priest of Siena, and of his nephew, Fausto Sozzini (1539-1604), who carried his teaching to Poland hitherto characterized only by the official acts of princes or generals; in studies of the problem groups of our own civilization, the poverty-stricken, affected by and as affecting the life of the community. Such studies as these last lead immediately to what is known as practical sociology or social work, which is the attempt to find the causation and the remedy of all the failures occurring in our social system.

Sociology in its various forms derives both interest and importance from the fact that modern civilization places man in intimate contact and dependence upon his fellows to an extent never before. The conquest of distance and time in communication, the ever-greater specialization of economic, educational, and other activities, require understanding and control of the influence of the community upon the life of the individual, and of the influence of the individual upon the life of the community, which will result only from a well-developed sociology.—C.E.; Blackmar and Gillin, Outlines of Sociology, N. Y., 1924. (E. F. Mack.)

Sodality

_Sociology (Lat., socius, companion; and Gr., logos, science), the study of man in his social life. Plato in his "Republic" and Aristotle in his "Ethics" and "Politics" wrote the first classical studies of social life, to which was added a Christian element by the medieval scholastics. These studies however were limited by special viewpoints, such as ethics, politics, economics, or religion. Sociology in its modern form, a generic study of all social relationships of whatever kind, is generally traced to Comte (1857), and Spencer (1903). There is some debate as to whether sociology should be rated as a distinct science, since scarcely any two authorities agree as to content, method, or principles. Treating a vast subject, coextensive with the life of man, a sociological work must be one of synthesis, as general as philosophy itself; hence, as in philosophy, differences of basic principles lead to conclusions of widest divergence. A careful appraisal of these basic principles in every writer must be made, for it is regrettable that practically all the standard works of general sociology are vitiated by false principles, such as evolutionary materialism, economic determinism, or anti-religious bias.

More valuable than most general works, are special sociological studies of limited phases of man's social life. Much important truth has been discovered and emphasized, for example, in history, by showing the character and importance of the life of the common people in various periods hitherto characterized only by the official acts of princes or generals; in studies of the problem groups of our own civilization, the poverty-stricken, the feeble-minded, the criminal, the unemployed, as affected by and as affecting the life of the community. Such studies as these last lead immediately to what is known as practical sociology or social work, which is the attempt to find the causation and the remedy of all the failures occurring in our social system._

Sodality of Saint Peter Claver, founded at Salzburg, Austria, 1804, by Countess M. Therese Leodoberska to aid the African missions and to foster the work of freeing slaves. It includes members of a female religious institute who are entirely engaged in the work of the African missions (these lead a community life in civilized countries, and have their headquarters at Rome); laymen and women who devote themselves as far as their state in life permits, to the work of the sodality, espe-
SODALITY

Sodality of the Blessed Virgin Mary. Special devotions in honor of the Blessed Virgin were practiced in the Jesuit schools in the 16th century. John León, a Belgian scholar, who had learned this pious custom from Father Sebastian Cabarassi, S.J., in Sicily (c. 1550) instituted the first sodality in the Roman College in 1563. Associations were formed in many schools in Europe and, at the request of Claudio Acquaviva, S.J., the Roman sodality was canonically erected (1584), with title "Suppliant of the Virgin Mary," for the majority of Sodalities consists of women.—C.E., XIV, 128; Manual of the Sodality of the Blessed Virgin Mary, N.Y., 1887.

Sodoma, II (Giovanni Antonio Bazzi, or de Bazzi; 1477-1549), painter, b. Vercelli, Piedmont, Italy; d. Siena. He was a follower of Leonardo da Vinci after living several years in Milan in his youth. After 1500 he lived and worked mainly in Siena, being famous for fresco characterized by sumptuous color and unusual beauty in the faces. In 1507 he was invited to Rome by Julius II to assist in decorating the Vatican. In 1513 he executed the frescoes of the "Life of Alexander" in the Villa Farnesina in Rome. Among his best works is the chapel of San Spirito. One of his masterpieces is the great banner of St. Sebastian now in the Uffizi gallery in Florence. He is considered to have been an extraordinary but uneven genius.—C.E.

Sodom and Gomorrah, só'dón, go-môr'rā, two cities of the Pentapolis, utterly destroyed by “brimstone and fire from the Lord out of Heaven" (Gen., 13, 18, 19), for the unnatural sins of their inhabitants. Their names are synonymous with impudent sin, and their fall with a manifestation of God's just wrath (Deut., 29; II Peter, 2; Jude, 7; Ezek., 16). Tradition says their site is covered by the Dead Sea, but geologically this is impossible; the exact location is unknown, but is included in "the country about the Jordan."—C.E.

Sador and Man, ancient diocese, founded as the Diocese of Man, possibly by St. Patrick, 5th century, and including the Scottish Isles until the 14th, whence Sodor or Suth-Eyar (Southern Isles). In 1542 the see was transferred to the Province of York. The last Catholic bishop was Thomas Stan-

SOLEMN

Solennity. (1) The state or quality of being solemn; solemn feeling, gravity. (2) A ceremonial observance, a rite expressive of religious reverence; a religious rite carried out in full according to the rubrics.—C.E. (c. j. b.)

Solenn Mass, (1) Originally a Mass at which the celebrant was aided by clerics of all the different ecclesiastical orders. (2) Mass at which the celebrant is aided by the deacon and sub-deacon, observing the complete ritual of the Church for the Mass. Such a Mass is called: Solenn, when celebrated by a priest; Pontifical, if celebrated by a bishop; Papal, when celebrated by the pope.—O'Brien, History of the Mass, 1878.

Sodesmes Abbey, a Benedictine monastery near Saldé, France, founded, 1010, by Geoffrey, seigneur of Saldé, as a priory dependent on the Abbey of St-Pierre de la Couture at Le Mans. Under Jean Bougler (1505-68), the last regular prior, two famous groups of statuary, known as the "Saints of Solesmes," were set up in the church. In 1791 the monastery was suppressed. Dom Prosper Guéranger took possession, 1833, and in 1836 began the Benedictine life there. Gregory XVI raised Solesmes to the rank of an abbey, 1837, making it at the same time the mother-house of the "Congregation of France." Branches were founded at Ligué; Silos, Spain; Glandenfeld; Fontenelles; Marnelles; Farnborough, England; Wisque; Paris; and Kergonan. Having been driven from France in 1903, the monks settled in the Isle of Wight. The community of Solesmes has achieved world-wide reputation for erudition; the restoration of the true Gregorian chant of the Church is perhaps its greatest work.—C.E.

Solomon. He was called "The Peaceful," because in contrast to David, his father, he secured victories by treaties and accommodation rather than by war; and Jedidiah (Beloved of Yahweh), because of the wisdom and goodness characteristic of his earlier years. The sources for his life are: 11 Kings, 1-12; 11 Par., 1-9. Although not the legal heir, being the second son by Bethsabee (Bathsheba), he was the favorite, and was chosen to succeed his father. Coming to the throne at the age of eighteen, he ruled for forty years. Unsurpassed among the Hebrews for sagacity, peace enabled him to organize the kingdom; provide for its defense by means of fortresses and a standing army; advance the orderly administration of justice; develop trade; and embellish the capital with magnificent edifices, the most noteworthy being the temple and his own palace. The expenses for these, however, as well as for his harem in later years, became so burdensome that on his death the kingdom was rent asunder. Many scholars think that the number of his wives and concubines should be...

Songish Indians, tribe of Salishan stock formerly living in Vancouver, now on reservations under the Cowichan agency. They had the clan-system castes, and had communal houses with carved totem posts. They made dug-out canoes and wore blankets. Their religion was animistic, with many curious beliefs. Their first missionary was Fr. Bolduc who arrived with the Hudson Bay Company in 1843. The first regular mission was founded by the Oblate Fr. d’Herbomez in 1857. In 1859 Fr. Casimir Chirouse came with two companions. The tribe has been wasted by smallpox, but is now prosperous. Son of Solomon, See CANTICLE OF CANTICLES.

Son of Man. This term occurs 82 times in the Gospel and, except on one occasion, is always used by Our Lord. There can be no doubt that the term is genuine, and that by it Our Lord meant to designate Himself. But why did He by preference call Himself the Son of Man? Some critics have thought that in the Aramaic of those days the speaker used to designate himself in this manner (as the Spaniards use usted, or vuestra merced, to designate the person spoken to); but after Dalman’s thoroughgoing research this view is no longer tenable. Rather Our Lord adopted the title both to reveal and to hide His messias-ship. It was regarded by the Jews as messianic, and hence by applying it to Himself Our Lord to all appearances claimed to be the Messiah; on the other hand, it did not bear that sinister anti-Roman meaning which the Jews had then given to other messianic titles.—C.E.; Felder, Christ and the Critics, Lond., 1924. Sons, Two, parable in St. Matthew’s Gospel, 21. It was spoken on Tuesday of Holy Week, and addressed to a deputation from the Sanhedrin. It is the story of a father who asked his two sons to go to work in his vineyard. The first son defiantly said he would not; but afterwards, being moved with repentance, he went. The second respectfully signified his immediate willingness to go, but he went not. Christ then assuming the offensive inquired of the audience which of the two did his father’s will. They responded in favor of the first son: whereupon Jesus said that publicans and harlots shall go into the Kingdom of God before the chief-priests, Scribes, and Pharisees, thus giving the meaning of the parable and convicting the members of the august Sanhedrin out of their own mouths. The interpretation of the parable is this: The certain man is God; the first son, the notorious sinners, at first rebellious but who repented at the preaching of John the Baptist; the second son, the Pharisees and their type, who professed to obey God but rejected the teaching of the Precursor. The parable is easy of application. It fits any age. The two son-classes of men of which the sons are the types are always found. Lip-service avails nothing. Sincerity and true repentance manifested in obedience to the will of God, regardless of former sin and rebellion, are the only means of entering the Kingdom of God—Madame Cecilia, St. Matthew, N. Y., 1906; Founck, tr. Leahy, The Parables of the Gospel, Tr., N. Y., now on reserves under the Cowichan agency. They had the clan-system castes, and had communal houses with carved totem posts. They made dug-out canoes and wore blankets. Their religion was animistic, with many curious beliefs. Their first missionary was Fr. Bolduc who arrived with the Hudson Bay Company in 1843. Sons of the Sacred Heart of Verona, an institute founded at Verona, Italy, in 1887 by Daniel Comboni, as a society of secular priests for the African missions. In 1885 the society became a congregation and its members were called Sons of the Sacred Heart. Until 1900 they were under the direction of the Jesuits. By a decree of 1923, the institute was divided into two congregations: the Congregation of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, for the missions of central Africa, comprising 140 religious, all Italians, and having its mother-house at Verona; and the Congregation of Missionaries of the Sons of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, composed of religious of Austrian, German, and other nationalities. The constitutions of both congregations are practically the same. Besides small residences in Italy, this society has a novitiate at Venelego near Milan, an apostolic school at Brescia, a novitiate for German-speaking members at Brixen (Tyrol), and a house at Gmünd (Austria). Missionary labor is carried on by the Sons of the Sacred Heart throughout the whole of the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan, and the northern section of the Uganda Protectorate; they are in charge of the vicariates Apostolic of Khartoum, and Bahrl-el-Ghazal and Uganda, and some of their members are at Cairo, Heluan, and Assuan in Egypt.—C.E.; Suppl., 648.

Sophonias (Heb., Zephaniah, the Lord protects), one of the Minor Prophets, lived under King Josiah near the end of the 7th century before Christ, a contemporary of Jeremiah. He favored the king's reforms. His prophecy contains three chapters on the evils that were to befall various nations, promising the coming of Christ, the conversion of the nations, and the final conversion of the Jews. The language of the prophecy is graphic; e.g., in speaking of the Lord: "Her princes are in the midst of her as roaring lions: her judges are evening wolves, they left nothing for the morning" (Soph., 3, 3). "Because then I will restore to the people a chosen lip, that all may call upon the name of the Lord, and may serve Him with one shoulder" (5, 9).—C.E.; Adams, The Minor Prophets, N. Y., 1902. Sorbonne, college in Paris, founded, 1257, as part of the University of Paris, by Robert de Sorbon (1201-74), professor and preacher, in order that the university might rival the Dominicans and Franciscans in offering gratuitous instruction in theology. The professors, called socii, followed the rules of the coenobitic life, excepting in regard to vows, and were controlled by an administrator (provisor) and the prior (primus inter pares), who presided over the internal affairs. There were two kinds of associates, the bursaires, who were provided for by the house and the pensionnaires, who paid forty pounds a year. Besides their classroom work, the associates had the duty of preaching and laboring in the parishes. The essential characteristics of the society were the equality in poverty of the masters and pupils. In 1271 Sorbon was added to the theological college, called the Collège de Calvi or "little Sorbonne." The institute, which maintained a high standard of scholarship, was favored by the Holy See and in 1470 introduced the art of printing into France. One of its principal patrons was Cardinal Richelieu, for a time provisor, who is buried in the church of the Sorbonne. It was a loyal defender of the Catholic faith against Protestantism, but gave its support to Gallicanism and obliged its members to subscribe to "the four articles." This weakened its prestige as a theological school and obliged the ecclesiastical students to study in the seminaries. It was suppressed, 1792, but restored by Napoleon, 1808, as the theological faculty of the newly-organized University of Paris. It was again suppressed, 1882, but in 1889 was reopened and is now occupied by the departments of letters and science of the University of Paris, forming the "Ecole des Hautes Etudes."—C.E.

Sorcery. See Witchcraft.

Sorin, Edward (1814-93), founder of Notre Dame, Indiana, b. Ahuillé, France; d. Notre Dame. Shortly after his ordination he was selected to establish the Congregation of the Holy Cross in the U. S. In 1841 he began the foundation of Notre Dame, at first a missionary station, later a prosperous educational institution. He also established the Sisters of the Holy Cross in the U.S., and founded the "Ave Maria" in 1855. He was superior-general of his order from 1868 to his death.—C.E.

Sorrows of the Blessed Virgin Mary, Feasts of the Seven. (1) Friday in Passion Week, commemorating the sorrow of Mary during the Passion and Death of Christ; instituted by the provincial synod of Cologne, 1413, to expiate the crimes of the iconoclasts in Egypt, being termed the "Compassion" or "Transfixion"; extended to the entire Church by Benedict XIII, 1727. The "Stabat Mater" is sung during Mass and Office. (2) 15 September, in devotion to the seven dolores of Mary: the prophecy of Simeon, flight into Egypt, loss of the Child Jesus at Jerusalem, meeting Jesus on the road to Calvary, standing at the foot of the Cross, the descent of Jesus from the Cross, and His burial. It was first granted to the Servites, 1668, and extended to the whole Church by Pius VII, 1814.—C.E.

Soter (Gr., deliverer), Saint, Pope (c. 167-175). Little is known of his reign. The legend is that he wrote a hortatory letter to the Corinthians, in which he evinced his paternal care, and which was acknowledged by St. Dionysius. He is said to have written a book against Montanism. Feast, R. Cal., 22 April.—C.E.; Butler.

Soul, ultimate interior principle of the life (ability to move self) of living bodies (see LIFE). There are three kinds of souls, vegetative or plant, animal, and rational (human). The soul is the "substantial form" of the living body, determining its species, e.g., geranium, dog, man. It is itself a substance and not an accident of the body; an incomplete substance, since it is by its nature destined for union with a body. According to Thomist doctrine, some disagreeing, there is in each living body only one substantial form, the soul, the principle of all informing, vivifying, and operating.

The human or rational soul is the ultimate interior principle vivifying the human body and rendering man capable of performing all his vital acts. Pius IX declared it to be Catholic doctrine that "the rational soul is the true, per se, and immediate form of the body." The soul is the proper object of the science of psychology (Gr., psyche, soul). Unfortunately much of the science that goes under the name, is more physiology than psychology. The human soul is integrally simple, has no part outside of part; otherwise ideation, judging, and reasoning cannot be explained; is spiritual since its operations are spiritual, as knowing the spiritual, the abstract, and the universal, reflecting on self, enjoying spiritual things, exercising freedom; internally immortal since spiritual, and externally immortal since God will not annihilate it. Scripture clearly teaches its immortality. The human soul is in the whole body and in each part of the body. It is created by God and, according to the more common modern opinion, infused into the body at the first instant of the latter's existence; so that, properly speaking, the term "soul" is applied to the formal principle of this life. So that, properly speaking, the term "soul" is applied to the formal principle of this life. This formal principle, or soul, is made up of the internal, spiritual life in the members of the Church and consequently in the Church itself. This formal principle, or soul, is the principle, or Soul, is made up of the internal, spiritual life in the members of the Church and consequently in the Church itself. This formal principle, or soul, is the spirit endowed with intellect and free will. The union between soul and body is substantial, resulting in one complete substance, which is a human person if we except the body and soul of Christ. Scripture informs us that the human soul will be judged after death, will be consigned to heaven or to hell, and on the Day of General Judgment re-united with its body, the composite thing which is of itself invisible, internal, and determinable to the Soul; yet ordinarily that distinction, in implicit, or Soul, is made up of the internal, spiritual life in the members of the Church and consequently in the Church itself. This formal principle, or soul, is the principle of the human nature, the human soul is integrally simple, has no part outside, of thing; otherwise ideation, judging, and reasoning cannot be explained; is spiritual since its operations are spiritual, as knowing the spiritual, the abstract, and the universal, reflecting on self, enjoying spiritual things, exercising freedom; internally immortal since spiritual, and externally immortal since God will not annihilate it. Soul of my Saviour, sanctify my breast! (Gr., psyche, soul). Unfortunately much of the science that goes under the name, is more physiology than psychology. The human soul is integrally simple, has no part outside of part; otherwise ideation, judging, and reasoning cannot be explained; is spiritual since its operations are spiritual, as knowing the spiritual, the abstract, and the universal, reflecting on self, enjoying spiritual things, exercising freedom; internally immortal since spiritual, and externally immortal since God will not annihilate it. Soul of the Church, The. Inasmuch as the Church is visible and supernatural, it has a visible, external element; and an invisible, internal element by which the visible element is informed, elevated, and determined, just as the living body is informed by the soul. Hence theologians distinguish in the Church the Body and the Soul. Although generally it is possible to refer anything which is visible, external, and determinable to the Body; and anything which is of itself invisible, internal, and determinable to the Soul; yet ordinarily that distinction is made on the basis of the internal, supernatural life. So that, properly speaking, the term "soul" is applied to the formal principle of this life. To these were added the Africans, imported as slaves. The states, originally European colonies, include Brazil, Chile, Peru, Bolivia, Argentina, Uruguay, Paraguay, Ecuador, Colombia, and Venezuela; British Guiana, Dutch Guiana, and French Guiana are colonies.

Southern American College. The, Rome, for Latin-American students, founded, 1858, by Pius IX and Ignatius Eyzaguirre. Of its students 25 have become cardinals of Latin America, Mgr. Arocorder de Albuquerque-Cavalcanti, Abp. of Rio de Janeiro, was chosen from their ranks.

South Carolina. The 39th state of the United States in size, the 20th in population, and the 8th state to be admitted to the Union (29 May, 1788); area, 30,959 sq. m.; pop. (1920), 1,683,724; Catholics (1928), 9,520. Among the Jesuits sent out in 1566, by Saint Francis Borgia, to the Spanish colonies of North America was Fr. John Rogel of Pamplona. In 1569 he went as missionary to the post of St. Helena, on Port Royal Sound, and soon after erected a chapel for the Indians at Oriste, about 12 leagues away. The indifference of the savages obliged him to abandon the post, and since Catholics were not welcome in the Carolinas under the English it was not until after the Revolution that Mass was said, in 1786, by an Italian priest, detained on a vessel in Charleston harbor, for a while living on aEverybody was amazed when John Rogel was chosen as bishop of the new diocese.

South Dakota. The 14th state of the United States in size, the 37th in population, and the 40th state to be admitted to the Union (2 Nov., 1889); area, 77,615 sq. m.; pop. (1920), 636,547; Catholics (1928), 106,934. The appeal of scattered Catholics along the upper Missouri to Bp. Loras of Dubuque for missionaries, about 1841, resulted in the visitations of Rev. Augustin Ravoux. He ministered to Indians and French Catholics at Fort Pierre in 1842 and 1847, and at Vermilion in 1843. In 1843 he printed, at Prairie du Chien, a devotional book in their own language for the Sioux Indians. Fr. Pierre de Smet, aided by Frs. Christian and Adrian Hoecken, visited Indian tribes of South Dakota, 1848-50, and Fr. De Smet traveled among them again in 1868. A parish was organized, 1867, among the French Catholics living at Jefferson, by Rev. Pierre Boucher, who became the pastor of St. Peter's, the first church in South Dakota. Included in the state are the Dioceses of Sioux Falls and Lead (qq.v.).

Catholic influence on place-names of the state is shown in the following: De Smet, Olivet, St. Charles, St. Francis, St. Herbert, St. Lawrence, St. Marys, St. Onge. The U. S. Religious Census of 1916 gave the following statistics for church membership in South Dakota:

- Catholic Church
- Methodist Episcopal Church South
- Methodist Episcopal Church North
- Congregational Church
- Lutheran Synodical Conference
- Northern Baptist Convention

Southern Baptist Convention, a group of separatists from the Baptist Church, who formed an organization at Augusta, Ga., in May, 1845, owing to a dispute over the slavery question. Although doctrinally in accord with those of the North, the southern Baptist churches are more strictly Calvinistic, and the Philadelphia Confession of Faith is more firmly adhered to than in northern churches. The Convention publishes 24 periodicals. It carries on foreign missionary work in China, Japan, Africa, Italy, Mexico, Brazil, and Argentina. In 1916 in these countries there were...

Jesus employs is a familiar picture of the Palestinian peasant sowing his field. Every detail of typical Galilean fields is depicted: the small footpaths ("waysides"), hard and beaten, running straight across the field; the parts strown with stones and boulders; the luxuriant growth of thorns and thistles; finally, the more or less good soil. The sower scatters the seed. Christ tells where each one falls and its fate. Some seed falls on the footpaths; it is trodden down or devoured by the fowl of the air; some on the rocky ground, this germinates and sprouts quickly, but having neither moisture nor roots it is scorched by the sun and withers away; other seed falls on better ground but the thorns and thistles depriving it of light and air choke it; a considerable portion falls on good soil and yields fruit in varying degrees were gathered. At the sixty, and a hundred fold. Christ Himself fully and minutely afterwards explained to His disciples the truths He would impart by this parable. The sower is Christ; the seed is the tidings of the Kingdom of God; the wayside, indifferent and careless Christians with hard and unimpressionable hearts; birds of the air, Satan; the rocky ground, supercilious Christians, creatures of impulse and without stability; scorching sun, temptations and persecutions for the faith; the thorny ground, inordinate desires and passions of the heart, and anxieties and allurements of the world. After showing the three-fold fate of the unfruitful seed, Jesus balances the picture and gives the tripe species of the fruitful seed seen in the thirty, sixty, and hundred-fold yield.
Points for application are inexhaustible. The precise date when this parable was uttered is uncertain; probably during the second year of His ministry. This parable is read, according to St.
Luke's account, on Sexagesima Sunday.—Madame

Space (Lat., spatium) is a notion derived by abstraction from our sense impressions. It is conceived as a medium constituted by extraposed parts in which our perceptions of bodies are localized.
In so far as there are really existing bodies possess­ ning quantity and hence extension, space may be regarded as real, but as an abstraction it is ideal, in the mind. Such space is uncurved and tri­ dimensional, i.e., Euclidian space. Mathematical space may have more than three dimensions and may be curved, either elliptic or hyperbolic. According to Einstein the real space of the world is curved, and hence the physical universe must be finite.—C.E.; McWilliams, Cosmology, N. Y., 1928.

Spain, constitutional monarchy, Europe; area, 190,050 sq. m.; pop. (1920), 21,347,335. Christianity was introduced into Spain during the Roman domination. According to tradition, the Apostles, Paul and James, and seven Apostolic men came to Spain and founded several churches. Prudentius claims that Spain had martyrs in every persecution. Under the Visigoths, the Catholic kings of France took upon themselves the protection of the Hispano-Roman Catholics. As a result of the religious unity formulated by the Third Council of Toledo (589), the Goths and Hispano-Romans united to form the Spanish nation. In 839 when Spain was under Arab rule, a council of archbishops and bishops met at Cordoba, and the age of the martyrs began, 850.
Persecution again broke out, 853, and monks, prebendaries, and priests were slaughtered. At the beginning of the Reconquest every element of the Spanish race was already present in the kingdom of the Catholic Goths: the Latinized Celtiberian race or Hispano-Romans, the Gothic element, and the Catholic Faith. To bring about a fusion of these elements, the terrible Muslim invasion was needed. As a result, the Goths and Hispano-Romans in the north formed one people with one religion.
and one aim, to recapture Spain and place the Cross above the Crescent. As the reconquest progressed, churches were rebuilt; Ferdinand I began a new restoration, convoked the Council of Coyanza (1050), fostered churches and monasteries, and restored many dioceses. The Cenicla reform entered Spain in the 11th century, and French monks greatly influenced the substitution of the Roman for the Mozarabic Rite. The Cistercian Reform was introduced when St. Bernard was still alive, and the cathedral chapters adopted the rule of St. Augustine.

At this time also the first military orders came into existence. In the 13th century the Carmelites, Dominicans, Franciscans, and the Order of the Most Holy Trinity established themselves in Spain. The religious unity of Spain was achieved by the expulsion of the Jews and the introduction of the Inquisition.

In 1812 the Cortes of Cadiz drew up the first Liberal Constitution, which showed some regard for Catholic unity. According to the Liberal Constitution of 1837, Catholic unity was not provided for, although the Catholic religion was declared to be that of the Spaniards. The Constitution of 1843 named Catholicity the state religion but the Constitution of 1851 settled the new conditions of the Church, and holds good to the present day. The Liberal Constitution of 1869 granted freedom of worship, maintaining the Catholic religion, however.

Finally the Constitution of 1876, under the Restoration, admitted religious toleration but held the supremacy of the Catholic Faith. At present the entire population of Spain, excepting a small minority of Protestants, Jews, and Rationalists, profess the Catholic religion. Liberty of worship is granted to all religious bodies. The Constitution requires the nation to support the clergy and the property of the Church. Although the Concordat of 1851 states that only the orders of Saint Vincent de Paul and Saint Philip Neri, with one other to be subsequently named, should be permitted in Spain, many other orders have been allowed to found houses there. The communities of the religious orders are numerous and influential, and the number of Catholic social enterprises is gaining rapidly. Spain in 1929 included the following ecclesiastical divisions:

SPEE, FRIEDRICH VON (1591-1635), poet and author, b. Kaiserswerth on the Rhine, Germany; d. Trier. He entered the Society of Jesus, 1610, was ordained priest, 1622, and was professor and preacher at Paderborn, Cologne, and Trier. His literary activities include a book of devotions entitled the "Golden Book of Virtues," and a collection of sacred songs, but his world-wide reputation is due to his "Cautio Criminalis" (1683), a denunciation of the prevailing method of trials for witchcraft with their instruments of torture.—C. E.

Sperling, Sir Henry (c. 1564-1641), historian, d. London. He was educated at Walsingham School and Trinity College, Cambridge. His experience in litigation over the leases of two abbeys, combined with a scandal connected with a church and parsonage in the possession of his uncle, caused him to write a pamphlet "De non temeraris ecclesiis," which induced many lay owners of ecclesiastical property to make restitution. This tract led to his "History and Fate of Saerilge," which traced the decay and ruin of many families in Great Britain whose ancestors seized church lands. This was supposed to have perished in the Great Fire, but part of it was discovered in the Bodleian Library.

Spire (A.-S., spir, a stalk), a tapering construction crowning a steeple or tower or surmounting a building. On the Continent the steeple and spire were merged into one, while in England a separate structure was preserved. It belongs to Pointed architecture and has been fully developed in Gothic buildings. Renaissance spires are merely steeples terminating in a point. (C.P.)

Spiritism (Lat., spiro, breathe). (1) The theory that the living can, and do communicate with the spirits of the departed, which claims to prove the preabl of all religion, and to establish or disprove by its methods the essential truths of Christianity. (2) The name given to the various practices by which such communication is attempted. Its phenomena are physical (raps, movements of tables, apparitions, etc.) and psychical (expressing ideas or containing messages), and its alleged results are often deceptive and farcical.—C. E.; Blackmore, Spiritism, Facts and Frauds, N.Y., 1924. (C. E.)

Spirit of Truth, name used by Our Lord for the Paraclete, the Holy Ghost, Who, He promised, would come and "teach you all things and bring all things to your mind, whatsoever I shall have said to you" (John, 14). (E. D.)

Spirits of Wickedness. The envy of Satan and his fallen hosts conspires against God and His reign over the souls of men. Lest the force of their spiritual attack from the "high places" be thought too lightly, St. Paul warns emphatically: "For our wrestling is not against flesh and blood; but against principalities and powers, against the rulers of the world of this darkness, against the spirits of wickedness in the high places" (Eph., 6). See PRINCIPALITIES OF EVIL. (R. S.)

Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius are not a treatise on mysticism or asceticism but a practical manual consisting of considerations and meditations to lead to the amendment and sanctification of one’s life and of certain practical rules. They are divided into four weeks, which occupy one for about thirty days and which correspond to the purgative, illuminative, and unitive ways of the spiritual life. The skillful arrangement of ideas supposes great psychological insight. The principle and foundation states the purpose of life, the attainment of salvation by serving God, and the consequent necessity of holding oneself in indifferance of will towards creatures and of using them only as they further this object. Meditations on sin and hell emphasize the effects of violation of this fundamental duty. The second week, primitive severity. The origin of the spiritual tendency in opposition to the larger observance of the community appears, from Angelo da Clareno’s "Chronicle," to be as old as the order itself. It became impossible for such a large moral body as the Franciscan Order to keep aloof from the great speculative and scientific movements of the 13th century. The majority accepted without reluctance the consequent modifications authorized by the sovereign pontiffs, but to some more zealous friars who considered their rule identical with the Gospel, every development seemed a departure from the first ideal of their founder. The reform party thus engendered consisted of three outstanding groups, in point of time and place: (1) the Spirituals of the Marches, c. 1274, under the leadership first of Liberato, then of Angelo da Clareno, 1307 (for their history see PRATICELLI); (2) the Spirituals of Provence, France, led by Pierre Jean Olivi, to which group is due the great process between the papal court at Avignon (1310-12); (3) the Spirituals of Tuscany, appearing in 1309, excommunicated by John XXII, 1318. The movement of the Spirituals failed in point of time and place: (1) the Spirituals of Provence, France, led by Pierre Jean Olivi, to which group is due the great process between the papal court at Avignon (1310-12); (2) the Spirituals of Tuscany, appearing in 1309, excommunicated by John XXII, 1318. The movement of the Spirituals failed to obtain recognition; it even led, through the errors of its leaders, to schism and heresy, but stricter observance of the rule, regenerated by their zeal and shortly after combined with full submission to authority, led the order to new prosperity.—C.E.

Splendor paterna glorie, or O Splendor of God’s Glory Bright, hymn for Lauds on Monday. It was written by St. Ambrose (340-397). About thirty translations are in existence; the English title given above is taken from “The Yattendon Hymnal.”—Britt.

S.P.M. = of the Fathers of Mercy (Societas Patrum Missionariorum).SPOKANE, Diocese of, Washington; established 1913; comprises Okanogan, Ferry, Stevens, Pend Oreille, Douglas, Grant, Lincoln, Spokane, Adams, Whitman, Benton, Franklin, Walla Walla, Columbia, Garfield, and Asotin counties; area, 30,192 sq. m.; suffragan of Oregon City. Bishops: A. F. Schinner (1914-25); Charles D. White (1927.-). Churches, 99; priests, secular, 48; priests, regular, 20; religious women, 291; university, 1; normal school, 1; academies, 5; parochial schools, 19; pupils in parochial schools, 2918; institutions, 9; Catholics, 30,460.

SPOKAN INDIANS, an important tribe of Salishan stock formerly found along Spokane River in Washington and adjacent parts of Idaho. They were first noted by Lewis and Clark in 1804. About 1841 they came under the influence of the Jesuits. The Washington tribes were gathered upon the Colville reservation in 1872. The Idaho tribes are associated with the Cœur d’Aléne and are all Catholics, while at Colville the Lower Band is Protestant. They closely resemble the Cœur d’Aléne and the Kaliwapas.—C.E.

Sponsor (Lat., sponsor, surety, godparent), a person of either sex who speaks for the one to be baptized during the ceremony and after Baptism assumes spiritual guardianship over the subject (see GODPARENTS). A sponsor must be baptized, fourteen years of age, and, at the font, must physically hold, touch, or receive the candidate. Parents, heretics, schismatics, and excommunicated are excluded. The sponsor contracts spiritual relationship with the godchild.—P.C. Augustine. (F.T.B.)

Spontaneous Generation means the origin of existence of living bodies from non-living or inert matter. In the strict meaning of the term it implies the origin of a living body from a non-living body, by the operation of some forms of energy or force such as the physicochemical powers of lifeless matter. In this sense it corresponds to the scientific term abiogenesis. In a wider sense it is taken to mean the origin of living bodies from non-living bodies but through the exercise of some force superior to the physicochemical power which belongs to all matter. It was in this latter sense that some scholastic philosophers used it to explain the appearance of low forms of life in decaying organisms. It is no longer considered possible. (J.A.M.)

Spoon. In the celebration of the Eucharist in Eastern Rites (Uniat) a spoon is used for conveying a part of the Host soaked in consecrated wine to the communicant. In some places a spoon is used to measure the Sacred Chalice at the celebration of the Mass. A spoonful of water is used also to help the sick swallow the Sacred Host.

SPRINGFIELD, Diocese of, Massachusetts; embraces Berkshire, Franklin, Hampshire, Hampden, and Worcester Counties; area, 4378 sq. m.; suffragan of Boston. Bishops: Patrick Thomas O'Reilly (1870-92); Thomas Daniel Beaven (1892-1920); Thomas M. O'Leary (1921). Churches, 230; priests, secular, 417; priests, regular, 30; religious women, 1397; colleges, 2; academy, 1; high schools, 24; parochial schools, 90; pupils in parochial schools, 43,545; institutions, 32; Catholics, 446,752.

SPRINGFIELD, Diocese of, Illinois, formerly diocese of Quincy, erected 1853; see transferred to Alton, 1857; to Springfield, 1923; comprises that portion of Illinois south of the northern limits of Adams, Brown, Cass, Menard, Sangamon, Macon, Moultrie, Douglas, and Edgar counties, and north of the southern limits of Madison, Bond, Fayette,Effingham, Jasper, and Crawford counties; area, 15,139 sq. m.; suffragan of Chicago. Bishops: Henry Damian Juncker (1857-68); Peter Joseph Baltes (1870-86); James Ryan (1888-1923); James A. Griffin (1924). Churches, 163; priests, secular, 189; priests, regular, 39; religious women, 1344; colleges, 2; seminaries, 2; academies, 5; high schools, 2; parochial schools, 63; pupils in parochial schools, 11,904; Indians, 194; Catholic, 93,732.

Spring Hill College, Spring Hill, Ala., founded, 1830; conducted by the Jesuits; preparatory school; college of arts and sciences; professors, 21; students, 171; degrees conferred in 1929, 25.

Spy Wednesday, in Holy Week, intimating that Judas Iscariot was watching the movements of Our Lord in order to betray Him to the Romans.

Squaw Indians, a considerable tribe of Salishan stock formerly dwelling about Squamish River, British Columbia, now on small reservations under Fraser River agency. Their first regular contact with white men began with the establishment of the Hudson Bay trading posts in British Columbia. They were evangelized by Fr. Demers, afterwards bishop of the Oblates, and the majority are Catholics.—C.E.

Squint, in medieval architecture, an oblique opening in the screen or chancel wall of a church, to enable those outside or in the aisles to see the main altar. Through these openings, or “squints,” the anchorites assisted at Mass.

Sr. = Sister.

S.S.C. = Societas Sancti Crucis (Society of the Holy Cross), an Anglican order.

S.S.D.N. = Sanctissimus Dominus Noster (Our Most Holy Lord [Jesus Christ]; also a title of the pope).

S., SS. = Saint, saints.

S.S.S. = Societas Sanctissimae Sacramenti (Fathers of the Blessed Sacrament).

Stabat Mater dolorosa, or At the Cross her station keeping, Sequence for the Masses of the feasts of the Seven Dolors on the Friday after Passion Sunday and on 15 Sept. For the Breviary Office the hymn is divided into three parts and assigned to the feast on the Friday after Passion Sunday: Stabat Mater dolorosa for Vespers; Sancta Mater, istud agas, for Matins; and Virgo virginum praecella, for Lauds. Other hymns are used in the Office on 15 Sept. The hymn is attributed to Jacopone da Todi (d. 1306), also to Innocent III (d. 1216), and to others. It has over 60 translations; the English title given above is by E. Caswall and is the most widely used. The beauty and pathos of this hymn have made it a favorite subject of composers. As it was not introduced into the Missal as a Sequence until 1727, its history in music dates largely from modern times. The first setting of importance is an elaborate one by Josquin des Prés (15th century). Palestrina wrote two beautiful settings. Among those with orchestra accompaniment the ones of Pergolesi, Haydn, Steffani, Clari, Baron D'Astorga, Von Winter, Pietro Raimondi, Vito, Lanza, Chevalier Von Neukomm, and Dvorák should be mentioned. Rossini's setting has been criticized because its sensuous beauty is inappropriate to the theme. The first verse of this hymn reads:

At the Cross her station keeping,
Stood the mournful Mother weeping,
Close to Jesus to the last:
Through her heart, His sorrow sharing,
All His bitter anguish hearing.
Now at length the sword had passed,

—C.E.; Brit.

Stabat Mater speciosa, or By the crib, wherein reposing, hymn not found in the Breviary. Whether or not this hymn was written by the author of the Stabat Mater dolorosa is a question of debate. The English title given above is by Denis F. MacCarthy.—C.E.; Brit.

Stained Glass, the popular name for the glass used in the making of colored windows, which really should be confined to glass painted with oxide of silver. Pot-metal, the glass usually employed in colored windows, is colored while in a molten state. Before the Christian era colored windows were made in the East by arranging small pieces of pot-metal. This process was adopted by the early Gothic builders and the pieces of glass were secured with strips of lead. The first painted windows were not durable but the art was revolutionized when the process of painting with metallic pigments fused into the glass was discovered. The new art had its center at Chartres. The method of paint-

Staphylus, Furchurch (1532-84), theologian, b. Osnabrück, Prussia; d. Ingolstadt, Professor at the University of Königsberg, he was under the influence of Luther's opinions, but was converted in 1552. He opposed Melanchthon at the Disputation of Worms and was active in the Catholic restoration of Bavaria and Austria, also in the reformation of the University of Ingolstadt, where he was professor of theology.—C.E.

Starr, ELIZA ALLEN (1824-1901), artist and writer, b. Deerfield, Mass.; d. Durand, Ill. She was a Catholic convert and the first woman to receive the Lætere Medal, which was conferred on her in 1865.—C.E.

State of Grace, the permanent disposition of soul formally constituted by the presence of habitual grace. Almighty God, in consideration of the redemptive merits of Christ, confers on the soul of His choice formal justification by the introduction of an intrinsic, physical, and permanent quality which rides the soul of sin and links it to God in the bonds of friendship. This permanent disposition of soul, marked by sinlessness and the fulfillment of God's Will is the state of grace, and it perseveres, unless it be destroyed by wilful mortal sin, through death, unto everlasting life.—Pohle-Peuss, Grace, St. L., 1921. (R. J. McL.)

State or Way, the progressive purification of the soul mounting upwards to contemplation. According to spiritual writers it is threefold: purgative, illuminative, and unitive. God begins by purifying souls, then He exercises them in virtue, and lastly He unites them more completely to Himself by the bonds of pure love.—C.E.; Devine, A Manual of Ascetical Theology, N. Y., 1902.

Stater, or Tetradrachm, a piece of money mentioned in the Bible (4 Kings, 7; Matt., 17), which Peter paid for Our Lord and himself as "tribute money." This was the contribution of every male adult Jew to the maintenance of the Temple services. It had the same value as the shekel (q.v.).

Station Days, appointed days on which the early Christians fasted until none, between twelve and three o'clock; usually feast days on which the faithful gathered at stated churches for the celebration of Holy Mass. As they remained standing or went in procession to, or around, the church, always on foot, some attribute the name to this fact (Lat., stare, to stand).—C.E. (Ezra, 2:38).

Stemmeyer (FARMER), FERDINAND (1720-86), Jesuit missionary, b. Swabia, Germany; d. Philadelphia. He was sent to Lancaster, and afterwards to Philadelphia, which city he made the center of missionary work extending even into the unfriendly state of New York. He was one of the first trustees of the University of Pennsylvania.—C.E.

Steno, NICOLAUSS (NIELS STENSEN) (1638-86), anatomist and priest, b. Copenhagen, Denmark; d. at Schwerin, Germany. Among his anatomical achievements was the discovery of the excretory duct of the parotid glands and the circulation of the blood in the body. When the unappreciative Danes finally called for him he had become a Catholic in Florence and as such could not return. In Italy he made many geological discoveries and was the first to explain petrifications in the earth. Ordained in 1675, he was made vicar Apostolic for the northern missions.—C.E.

Stephen, SAINT, protomartyr of the Church, first of the seven deacons chosen by the Apostles to manage the temporal affairs of the Church, d. first year after the death of Christ. Little is known of his life except that he was a Jew, although his name Stephen is Greek, and he spoke Greek, from which it is inferred that he was born outside of Palestine. As deacon he administered to the welfare of the Hellenist Christians, and distinguished himself in controversy with the Jews. Inciting their fear and hatred by his courageous harangues before the Sanhedrin, he was falsely accused of blasphemy and stoned to death (Acts, 6). Patron of stonemasons. Relics in the Church of St. Lawrence. Feast, R. Cal., 26 Dec.—C.E.; Butler.

Stephen, SAINT, first king and apostle of Hungary, confessor (875-1038), b. Gran; d. Stuhlweissenburg, son of Geza, prince of the Magyars. He was baptized, 986; married Gisela, sister of Emperor St. Henry II; succeeded to the throne, 997; was crowned by Pope Sylvester II, 1001, and was granted the right to establish episcopal sees; founded a monastery at Jerusalem and hospices in Rome, Ravenna, and Constantinople; gave his kingdom a Christian constitution and an ecclesiastical foundation by establishing 10 bishoprics. Patron of Hungary. His incorrupt right hand is in the national palladium. Feast, R. Cal., 2 Sept.—C.E.; Butler.

Stephen I (Gr., stephanos, a crown), SAINT, Pope (254-257), b. Rome; d. there. His most important work was a defense of the validity of heretical baptism against the mistaken opinions of St. Cyprian and other bishops of Africa. He is said to have ordained that vestments used for ecclesiastical purposes should not be employed for daily wear. Feast, R. Cal., 2 Aug.—C.E.; Butler.

Stephen II, POPE (752), b. Rome; d. there. A priest, he was elected by the entire populace, but died before his consecration. He is included in the list of popes, but the consequence of his premature death has been to throw into disorder the numbers assigned to the succeeding Popes Stephen.—C.E.; Mann.

Stephen II, POPE (752-757), b. Rome; d. there. As pope he crowned Pepin King of the Franks, and from him received aid against the Lombard Aistulf. He became practically the first... pope-king when he accepted from Pepin the cities of the exarchate of Ravenna, and of the Pentapolis, 756. By recognizing Desiderius as King of the Lombards he averted a civil war, 757. In the matter of iconoclasm he was less successful, and Emperor Constantine V attacked the veneration of images by promulgating the decrees of the mock-synod of Constantinople, 754.—C.E.; Mann.

Stephen (III) IV, Pope (768-772), b. Sicily, c. 720; d. Rome. A Benedictine, his election was opposed by the antipopes Constantine and Philip. During his pontificate the Lateran Council declared that only cardinals might become pope, and deprived laymen of any part in the election. With the aid of the Franks he regained territory from the Lombards. A decree of his, which is in force today, permits only the pope or specially appointed cardinals to offer Mass on the high altar in the Lateran.—C.E.; Mann.

Stephen (IV) V, Pope (816-817), b. Rome; d. there. He caused the Romans to acknowledge as suzerain, Louis the Pious, whom he crowned at Reims, 816, and with whom he renewed the pact between the Holy See and the Franks.—C.E.; Mann.

Stephen (V) VI, Pope (885-891), b. Rome; d. there. A wealthy priest, after his election, he used his wealth to refill the depleted papal treasury and to repair the sacked pontifical buildings. He crowned Guido II of Spoleto emperor, 891; recognized Louis the Blind of Provence; sent the schismatic Photius into exile; and is said to have condemned the custom of trial by ordeal. He received many English pilgrims at Rome, and upheld the primacy of the Roman See when he consecrated Bp. Teutbold of Langres against the wishes of Abp. Aurelian.—C.E.; Mann.

Stephen (VI) VII, Pope (896-897), b. Rome; d. there, by strangulation. He was Bp. of Anagni before his election. Although letters extant from the beginning of his reign show that at first he was zealous for the welfare of the Church, his pontificate was impaired by his council, 897, in which the process of Formosus was completed at the instigation of Ageltruda and her son Lambert, the political leaders of Rome.—C.E.; Mann.

Stephen (VII) VIII, Pope (929-931), b. Rome; d. there. A cardinal-priest, very little is known of his reign except that it was untroubled.—C.E.; Mann.

Stephen (VIII) IX, Pope (939-942), b. Rome; d. there. A cardinal-priest, after his election he supported the declining Carolingian dynasty and forced the nobles, by threats of excommunication, to be faithful to the Frankish king, Louis IV. His pontificate was troubled by a war in Italy between Alberic and Hugh of Provence.—C.E.; Mann.

Stephen (IX) X, Pope (1057-1058), b. c. 1000; d. Florence, Italy. He was made chancellor and librarian of the Apostolic See by Leo IX, who sent him to Constantinople, 1054, on the embassy which terminated in the separation of the Eastern and Western churches. He was made cardinal, and abbot of Monte Cassino. During his pontificate he carried on his work of ecclesiastical reform with the aid of St. Peter Damian, and Card. Humbert and Hildebrand. He died on the eve of a Norman invasion.—C.E.; Mann.

Sterility, incapacity for procreating offspring, which may be natural owing to some physical defect, or artificial when caused by an operation removing or severing part of the organs of generation. Sterilization, as this latter is called, may be necessary and justifiable in certain cases, but it is wrong to perform it on men or women, as certain eugenists advocate, merely because they are defective or abnormal.—Bruehl, Birth-Control and Eugenics, N. Y., 1928. (Ed.)

Sterilization is the term used to describe the surgical operation by which a human being is directly rendered incapable of reproduction. It is advocated as an eugenic measure to prevent the increase of the foible-minded. Sterilization is a desecration of human dignity and an encroachment on personal liberty, but may be imposed by a state when three conditions are verified: (1) that it is established that feeblemindedness is usually inherited; (2) that the number of mental defectives creates a serious burden or danger to the community; and (3) that the state is without other means of protecting itself. None of these conditions is verified at present. Moreover, serious evils would follow the introduction of sterilization, namely, the unnecessary use of the operation, increased sexual promiscuity, and venereal disease.—Bruehl, Birth-Control and Eugenics, N. Y., 1928; O'Malley, Ethics of Medical Homicide and Mutilation, N. Y., 1919. (F. J. H.)

Stevin, Simon (1548-1620), mathematician, b. Bruges, Belgium; d. Leyden, Netherlands. He exerted an everlasting influence on the development of science by his explanation and use of calculus, his work on mechanics, and his treatise on navigation and on fortifications. He was the first to set forth the hydrostatic paradox, the equilibrium of bodies on inclined planes, and a solution of equations of the third degree by means of successive approximations.—C.E.

Stigmata, Mystical. There are two kinds: visible and invisible. (1) Visible, a sort of impression of the Sacred Wounds of the Saviour, on the feet, hands, side, and forehead. These wounds appear spontaneously, without being provoked by any external wounding, and they issue periodically a non-corrupted blood. (2) Invisible, which cause great suffering without the outward marks. Stigmatization only exists among ecstatics, and is preceded and accompanied by very severe suffering, physical and moral, which renders the subject conformable to Jesus' suffering; not pathological, but due to the intervention of an intelligent and free cause acting on the stigmatics. Stigmata are symbols of union with Christ and participation in His martyrdom; found only on persons who practise the most heroic virtues and have a great love of the cross. The first stigmatic known is St. Francis of Assisi. Venerable Gertrude van der Ousten (d. 1358), received the sacred stigmata because of her great devotion to the Sacred Passion. Dr. Imbert names 321 stigmatics, in whom there is every reason to believe Divine action. Great precaution is needed in determining whether stigmata be real, apparent, or due to self-deception on the part of the stigmatist.—C.E.; Poullain, tr. Smith, The Graces of Interior Prayer, Lond., 1910.

STIPEND (Lat., stipendium, a tax), a canonical term employed to designate in general the means of support for the clergy (congrua). It is part of the revenues of a benefice assigned to those clerics who are attached to that benefice. At present this term is more frequently and popularly used to signify the offering made on the occasion of having Mass offered for one's intention.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine.

Stoddard, Charles Warren (1843-1909), author and convert, b. Rochester, N. Y.; d. Monterey, Cal. On his frequent trips to the South Seas, he became intimate with Stevenson and visited Father Damien at Molokai. As a newspaper correspondent he traveled in Europe, Palestine, and Egypt; and for a while taught literature at Notre Dame University and the Catholic University at Washington. His best works are "The Lepers of Molokai," "Exits and Entrances," and "Idyls."—C.E.

Stole (Lat., stola, long garment), liturgical vestment composed of a strip of material about three inches wide and eighty long, sometimes widening at ends spade-shape; often made of silk and embroidered; worn around the neck by priests and bishops, at the left shoulder like a sash by deacons, for the celebration of Mass, administration of sacraments, and ceremonies of Blessed Eucharist.—C.E.

Stone of Stumbling, in 1 Peter, 2, an expression borrowed from Isaiah, 8 (as in Romans, 9): it applies to God in Isaiah but to Christ in the N.T. Christ is the corner-stone of the Church; for those who do not accept Him as such and unite themselves with Him, he is a "rock of scandal," that is an occasion for stumbling and falling. In the same sense, Simeon foretells (Luke, 2) that the newly-born Saviour will be for the fall and resurrection of many. (W. S. B.)

Stones, Precious, in Bible. The precious stones mentioned in the Bible are the agate, amethyst, beryl, carbuncle, carnelian, chalcedony, chodoch or oriental ruby, chrysoprasus, coral, crystal, emerald, hyacinth, jasper, ligurius, onyx, pearl, ruby, sapphire, sardonyx, and topaz. They are chiefly of interest in connection with the breast-plate of the high priest (Ex., 28), the treasure of the king of Tyre (Ezech., 28), and the foundation of the New Jerusalem (Apoc., 21).—C.E.

Stoning was one of the methods of capital punishment among the Hebrews. It was inflicted outside the camp or the city (Lev., 24; Num., 15; Acts, 7). The witnesses were required to cast the first stone (Deut., 13, 17).—C.E. (E. A. A.)

Stonyhurst College, Blackburn, Lancashire, the oldest Catholic school in England. In 1592 Father Robert Persons, S.J., founded the school at St.-Omer in Artois, to provide for English boys the Catholic education forbidden by law in England. Among the early alumni were twenty-one martyrs, and John Carroll and Leonard Neale, the first two Abps. of Baltimore. Compelled in 1702 to leave France, the school went to Bruges and to Liége; in 1794 a former student, Thomas Weld, gave Stonyhurst Hall for their use. The college and a preparatory school, Hodder, are still conducted there by 24 Jesuits.—C.E.

Stoss, VETT (1438-1533), sculptor, b. Nuremberg; d. there. From 1477-96 he lived in Cracow, Poland, where he directed a large workshop. One of the masterpieces of his wood-carving is his altar-screen in the church of Our Lady at Cracow. It is crowded with figures and full of vigor. He spent the remainder of his life in Nuremberg, working in close union with Peter Vischer. His best work there is the beautiful "Annunciation" in the church of St. Lawrence. The figures of the archangel and Mary are surrounded by a wreath of roses in which are represented the Seven Joys. The "Carrying of the Cross," and the "Burial of Christ," in the church of Our Lady, are also his.—C.E.

Stoup. See Holy Water Fonts.

Stowe Missal, a parchment codex of 65 folios, called Missal because of its more important parts; called Stowe, because it was at one time in the possession of the Duke of Buckingham, the owner of the Stowe MSS. It contains extracts from the Gospel of St. John, Ordinary of the Mass, and orations for 3 proper Masses, one Ordo for Baptism, for visiting the sick, and an Irish treatise on the Mass.—C.E.

Stradivari, ANTONIO (c. 1644-1737), violin-maker, b. place unknown; d. Cremona, Italy. Pupil of Nicolò Amati, probably 1658-79, the first authentic instrument of Stradivari's workmanship is dated 1666. His finest pieces were executed in the period 1700-25, among them the "Aldrov" violin and the "Piatti" violoncello.—Francesco (1671-1743), eldest son of preceding, inherited some part of his father's skill, producing instruments of merit and originality.

—OMONBO (1679-1742), son of Antonio and partner of his brother, Francesco. His work was confined to the repair and fitting up of instruments.

—PAOLO BARTOLOMEO (1708-76), youngest son of Antonio, was a cloth merchant. In 1775 he sold his father's collection of relics to the Count Costo di Salabue, from whom they passed to the Marquis Dalla Valle.—C.E.

STUART, JAMES FRANCIS EDWARD (1688-1766), Prince of Wales, titularly James III of England, and VIII of Scotland, known as the Chevalier de St. George and the "Old Pretender" to the throne of Great Britain, b. London; d. Rome. He was the son of James II (q.v.); taken to France because of the English Revolution, when six months old; served with the French in the Low Countries, wounded at Malplaquet, 1709; made a descent upon Scotland, 1708; and participated ineffectually in the Earl of Mar's Jacobite rebellion, 1715. He was granted a papal pension, 1727.

—CHARLES EDWARD (1720-88), son of preceding, titulary Charles III, called the "Young Pretender," and known as "Bonnie Prince Charlie," leader of the rising of 1745, b. Rome; d. there. Landing in the Hebrides, 1745, he rallied the Highland clans at Glenfinnan; captured Edinburgh; held court at Holyrood; routed Sir John Cope at Prestonpans; invaded England, and was victorious at Falkirk, but was defeated by the Duke of Cumberland at Culloden, 1746. A fugitive in the Highlands, hunted by the "Red Coats," £30,000 offered for his head was spurned by the loyal clansmen who sheltered him. After romantic adventures, he escaped to France from Moldart. The Catholic highlands were laid waste and a violent persecution followed.

—HENRY BENEDICT (1725-1807), son of James Francis Edward, cardinal, Duke of York, titularly Henry IX, prelate, b. Rome; d. Frascati, Italy. He was made cardinal, 1747; received Holy Orders, 1748; archpriest of the Vatican Basilica and cardinal camerlengo; titular Abp. of Corinth, 1759; Card.-Bp. of Frascati, 1761, where he founded a seminary and donated a fine library. Impoverished by the confiscation of his property by the French Revolution, George III pensioned him until his return to Frascati, 1800. He became Bp. of Ostia and Velletri, and Dean of the Sacred College, 1803.

STUDIES, CONGREGATION OF, a congregation founded by Leo XII, 24 Aug., 1824, to supervise all universities and colleges in the Papal States. By the provisions of Pius X, in 1908, it exercised its influence throughout the Catholic world. It directed the studies of all the greater universities or faculties under the authority of the Church, not excepting those under religious orders or congregations. It granted the faculty of conferring academic degrees, which it might also confer itself and which in that case had the same value as those conferred by an ecclesiastical university. It authorized the establishment of new universities as well as changes in the conditions of universities already established. It was organized like the other congregations with one of the cardinals as prefect. On 4 Nov., 1915, Benedict XV united it to the newly established Congregation of Seminaries and Universities of Studies.—C.E., XIV, 146.

STYLITES or PILLAR SAINTS (Gr., stylos, pillar), solitaries who dwelt upon the ruins of structures surrounding columns or pillars, exercising asceticism, preaching, and otherwise helping people in a spiritual way. They were most numerous in Syria, Palestine, and Mesopotamia in the 5th century. St. Simeon the Elder (c. 388-459), a Syrian monk, was the first to adopt this mode of life, 423. He had many followers and imitators, among them St. Daniel at Constantinople, St. Simeon the Younger, near Antioch, St. Alypius, near Adrianople, and St. Luke the Younger, on Mt. Olympus. Women Stylites were also known. Sporadic cases existed in the East down to the 12th century, and among the Russians and Ruthenians, as late as the 15th. The only example in the West was the deacon Wulfliacus, who erected a pillar near Trier, 585, but was compelled by the bishops to abandon it. The excesses of austerity characteristic of the Stylites can be justified by the exigency of impressing upon an age of social and moral decadence the necessity of penance.—C.E.

Suarez, Francisco, Doctor EXIMIUS (1548-1617), Jesuit Scholastic theologian, b. Granada; d. Lisbon. He taught philosophy and theology at Alcala, Segovia, Rome, Alcalá Salamanca, and Coimbra, establishing the "Suarez classes," suppressed later by Charles III. His numerous writings on theology are still greatly esteemed.

He wrote "De Defensione Fidei" (1613), which was burned in London and forbidden in Paris as being too democratic. He is considered by Mackintosh as one of the founders of international law.—C.E.

Subdeacon (Gr., diakonos, a servant). The subdiaconate is the lowest of the three major orders in the Latin Church and a minor order in the Greek Church. The subdeacon is empowered to carry the chalice with wine to the altar, prepare the necessary for the Eucharist, and read the Epistle before the altar; he is bound to celibacy and the daily recitation of the Breviary.—C.E.

Subiaco College, Subiaco, Ark., founded, 1878; conducted by the Benedictine Fathers; preparatory and graduate schools; college of arts and sciences;
The etymological meaning of the word gives an idea of its nature. In philosophy, the theory that explains human knowledge by a priori forms, i.e., by categories or mental moulds which are independent of experience and observation and innate to the mind. Subjectivism is the assertion that the nature expressed in universal ideas does not correspond to the nature in the singular thing known. Kant knew nothing of the Scholastic doctrine of abstraction, by which the active intellect (intellectus agens) separates what is contingent and particular from the nature, and leaves the nature, which is necessary, in its essential predicates and universal or abstract in the mind. The abstract, universal nature is found in singular things and verified in them.

Subjectionism (Lat., sub, under; and jaecer, to throw or place) is the withholding of the truth in a petition for some favor. It does not prevent a favorable answer given in reply from being effective, provided that those things that have to be expressed in accordance with "curial style" for validity have been expressed. Subscriptions, Episcopal (Lat., subscriba, tribute, pecuniary aid). Taxes to which the bishop has an exclusive right. Ordinarily contributions made by the faithful are voluntary, but positive legislation has given to the bishop the right of imposing certain definite taxes to defray the expenses necessary in the exercise of his office. Ordinary taxes are the cathedratic taxes to defray the expenses necessary in the exercise of his office. The bishop can also impose an extraordinary tax on the diocese when necessity requires it. In many dioceses of the United States the bishop makes a yearly appeal for charity, but this is more in the form of a voluntary contribution by the faithful than a direct tax. The bishop cannot impose a tax on Mass stipends.

Subsides, Episcopal (Lat., subsidia, tribute, pecuniary aid). Ordinary taxes are the cathedratic taxes to defray the expenses necessary in the exercise of his office. The bishop can also impose an extraordinary tax on the diocese when necessity requires it. The bishop cannot impose a tax on Mass stipends.

Subsidiary Dioceses. See Cardinalitial Dioceses.

Succursal Churches, missions or churches, which, because of their scanty or fluctuating population or insufficient resources, cannot be formed into regular parishes and therefore remain temporarily included in regular parishes as subsidiary and dependent churches or chaplaincies. Their rectors exercise the care of souls and have the obligations of ordinary parish priests, excepting that of offering the Mass for the People, the "missa pro populo." See CHAPEL OF EASE.—Ayrinhac, Constitution of the Church, N. Y., 1925.

Suez Canal, Vicariate Apostolic of, Egypt; comprises eastern Egypt from 24° N. lat. to the Mediterranean Sea, with an irregular western boundary; includes Port Said, Ismailia, Port Tewfik, and Suez, also Akaba in Arabia; established 1926; entrusted to the Friars Minor. Residence at Ismailia or Port Said.

Sufficient Grace. God's special assistance to man for the attainment of salvation, or for the performance of a single action directly and positively conducive to the accompaniment of the act. In its essence it is identical with efficacious grace, but if it remains merely sufficient, it lacks its effect through the failure of the human will to cooperate. In such an instance, the good work which man assisted by sufficient grace might have performed remains undone. Sufficient grace, in its whole essence and in God's intent, is a clear favor from God to man; granted in consideration of Christ's merits and redemption.—Pohle-Preuss, Grace, St. L., 1921.

Suffragan (Lat., suffragare, to assist). Formerly the word was sometimes used as a synonym for auxiliary bishop. Now it refers to a bishop of a diocese considered in relation to his archbishop. A suffragan yields precedence even in his own diocese to his archbishop, but, save in such matters as law or custom has otherwise decreed, in the government of his diocese the suffragan is independent of archiepiscopal jurisdiction. With the other suffragans under the presidency of the archbishop he has equal title given is composite, based on Chambers.—Britt.

Sufragans, additional prayers for different intentions which, due to the piety of particular com-unities, have remained in the Office to the present day. These include the commemorations of certain saints and of the Cross. The suffrages of the saints at Vespers and Lauds were inserted in the Office through the influence of monastic reformers. In the new Psalter the suffrages are abolished and replaced by a single commemoration.—Burton and Myers, New Psalter and Its Use, N. Y., 1912.

Suicide (Lat., sui, self; cedo, kill) is deliberate death or self-destruction. Suicide is direct when it is intended as an end or a means to an end. Direct suicide is intrinsically evil and is forbidden by the natural and positive law of God. Suicide is indirect when intended neither as an end nor a means to an end, as when a man perishes in an attempted rescue.—
C.E.; Frenay, The Suicide Problem in the United States, Bost., 1927.

Suitbert (Suidbert, or Suidberht), Saint, conlector (d. 719), apostle of the Frisians, b. England;
d. Suitberts-Insel (Kaiserswerth), near Düsseldorf.
With St. Willibrord, he labored to evangelize the Frisians in N. Brabant, Guelderland, and Cleves.
He was consecrated in Mercia as missionary bishop by St. Wilfrid of York and upon his return, established a see at Wijkbijl. The invading Saxons forced him to withdraw to his monastery near Düsseldorf.
Relics at Kaiserswerth. Feast, 1 March.—C.E.; Butler.

Sullivan, Alexander Martín (1830-1884), Irish politician and lawyer, b. Bantry; d. Darby Lodge, Rathmines, Dublin. Editor of the "Nation," he made it a great national paper, and also issued the "Weekly News" and "Zozimus." He was M.P. for Louth (1874) and afterwards for Meath, and when called to the Irish bar in 1876, was made Q.C. and engaged in many notable trials.—C.E.

Sullivan, Peter John (1821-1883), soldier and lawyer, b. Cork, Ireland; d. Cincinnati, Ohio. Emi-grating to America, he attended the University of Pennsylvania; he served in the Mexican and Civil wars, was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteeer and, soon after, appointed U. S. minister to Colombia. He was a notable opponent of the Know-Nothing movement.—C.E.

Summae Deus clementiae, or God of Mercy, let us run, hymn for Lauds on 15 Sept. Feast of the Seven Dolors of Our Lady. It is attributed to Callisto Palmella, who lived in the 18th century.
Six translations are in existence; the English title given is by F. Faber.—Britt.

Summae Parens clementiae [Da], or O God,
by whose command is swayed, hymn for Matins on Trinity Sunday. It is composed of stanzas from other hymns. The English title given is taken from the Primer of 1706.—Britt;

Sunday, the name of the first day of the week became universally familiar during the 1st and 2nd centuries when the week of seven days, to which were given the Roman names of the seven planets, was first introduced into Rome from Egypt. According to Jewish reckoning, Sunday was the first day of the week and in Apostolic times it began to take the place of the Jewish Sabbath, as the day of worship. In Acts, 20, it is mentioned as the day when the faithful "assembled to break bread"; St.
Ignatius of Antioch (1st century; Ep. ad Magnes, IX) writes that Christians no longer observe the Sabbath but the Lord's Day on which also Our Life rose again; St. Justin (2nd century) is the first Christian writer to call the day Sunday (1 Apology, LXVII). Thus during the first three centuries Sunday was consecrated to the public worship of God. In the 4th century, the Council of Elvira, and the Apostolic Constitutions prescribed the keeping of Mass and rest from work, and in later councils many decrees were made concerning the pious observance of Sunday. Resting from work, first mentioned by Tertullian (202), was not made obligatory until the 8th century when the law was formulated as it exists today. Since then much civil legislation has been passed on the observance of Sunday. Under Puritan influence many laws were passed in England and Scotland which make the Sabbath observance very stringent even today. In the United States, nearly every State has statutes regulating unnecessary labor on Sunday, and in some States laws are still in force against certain forms of recreation.—C.E.

Sunday. Popular name of various Sundays and their places in the ecclesiastical year. (The names of these Sundays are derived either from the first word of the Introit, from the subjects of the Gospel, or from customs peculiar to these days.)

Sunday in Christmas Week. If this Sunday occur on Christmas Day, or on one of the three days following, the Mass is deferred until 30 Dec. If it occur on 29 or 31 Dec., the Mass is said with a commemoration of St. Thomas or St. Sylvester.

Sun of Justice, name of Our Lord, mentioned in the Bible: "But unto you that fear my name, the Sun of justice shall arise" (Mal., 4).

Superior, one who governs a religious community. The code of canon law divides superiors into two classes: major or higher superiors, and minor or local superiors. The term major superior comprises the superior-general of an entire congregation or order; the provincial superiors, who govern a number of houses; and the superior (abbot) of an independent monastery. Local superiors govern only the community in which they live. Major superiors have no fixed term of office set by common law, though the rules of individual orders and congregations may determine a fixed period. They may not be appointed for life. Local superiors, on the contrary, may not remain in office for more than two consecutive terms of three years each in the same community (can. 505). The title is also given to the priest in charge of the ecclesiastical organization called a Mission (q.v.)—P.C. Augustine.

Superior, Diocese of, established, 1905; embraces Ashland, Barron, Bayfield, Burnett, Douglas, Iron, Lincoln, Oneida, Polk, Price, Rusk, Sawyer, St. Croix, Taylor, Vilas and Washburn Counties: area, 15,715 sq. m.; suffragan of Milwaukee. Bishops: Augustin Francis Schneider (1905-1913); Joseph M. Kondelka (1913-1921); Joseph G. Pinten (1922-1926); Theodore Henry Revennan (1926). Churches, 150; priests, secular, 70; priests, regular, 24; religious women, 272; high schools, 2; parochial and mission schools, 26; pupils in parochial schools, 5242; institutions, 11; Catholics, 54,804 (of whom 2186 are Indians).

Supernatural Order (Lat., super, above; nature, nature). God's creative act was entirely free. Our existence as creatures is a gift of His Divine liberality. Once created, however, all beings have a claim to certain specific perfections, requisite for their continued existence, natural development, and the accomplishment of their destined function. Mere reason and wisdom makes it impossible that these claims should be ignored. Taken in the aggregate, the sum-total of all these perfections in all creatures constitutes the natural order. Restricting the question to mankind, we discover that men might have had actual existence in this natural order alone. From the very dawn of rational creation, however, Almighty God superimposed on nature, without abrogating it in any sense, a new, undeserved, wholly gratuitous outlay of perfections, beyond all created nature's capacities or aspirations. The crown and consummation of this liberal and utterly free endowment is the possession of God Himself in the life to come, by intuitive knowledge and love. Its concrete expression in life on earth is the order of grace. Parallel with the course of nature, the supernatural order of grace marks every step of the just man's development. The root and principle of natural activity is the human soul; the root and principle of supernatural activity is sanctifying grace, that inherent, permanent quality adorning the soul, rendering it capable of eliciting acts of knowledge and love otherwise restricted to God's personal omnipotence. The natural faculties of intellect and will are enriched by the infused virtues, those strictly supernatural principles of activity capable of elevating the natural thoughts and affections of mankind into salutary and meritorious acts of faith, hope and love. For every natural virtue there is a supernatural counterpart, so that no element of human mental structure lacks its peculiar supernatural equivalent; no thought, word or desire need be merely natural, all may have a bearing on the sublime, supernatural destiny ordained by God for man's everlasting happiness. The complex of this transcendent destiny, and the concomitant, proportioned means for its achievement, which is built on nature, designed for nature and operates with nature, constitutes the order of grace, the supernatural order.—C.E.; Wilhelm and Scannell, Manual of Catholic Theology, Lond., 1906. (R. J. Mcl.)
Superstition, is a “vice opposed to religion by way of excess, not because in the worship of God it does more than true religion, but because it offers Divine worship to beings other than God or offers worship to God in an improper manner” (St. Thomas). To honor God with ceremonies approved by the Church is true worship, and not superstition. On the other hand based worship on rejected rites, heresy, spurious revelations, and the like is false, while concession to circumstances of an efficacy they have not is superfluous and superstitious. —C.E.

Surius, Laurentius (1522-1578), hagiologist, b. Lübeck, Germany; d. Cologne. He was a one-time heretic, converted by St. Peter Canisius, a fellow student at Cologne University. In the Carthusian monastery at Cologne, he wrote a church history and hagiography, translated into Latin many ascetical and theological works, opposed Slevianus, and was the author of a collection of the Acts of the Councils. His most valuable work is his collection of the lives of the saints.—C.E.

Surplice (Lat., super, over; pellicere, fur-clothing), a large-sleeved tunic of half-length, made of linen or cotton, ungirdled, and embroidered at hem and sleeves. It is a liturgical vestment worn by all clergy in choir, processions, Benediction, etc.—C.E.

Suspension (Lat., suspense, to hang up), in general, signifies an interruption or prohibition. Canonically, it is a censure by which a cleric is forbidden either to exercise the rights attached to his office or benefice or both at the same time. Suspension is a medicinal punishment, as well as a spiritual chastisement, for past offenses. Historically considered, it is a milder form of the ancient discipline of deposition and degradation. Only clerics are subject to suspension, which does not take away the power of sacred orders, but only prohibits their lawful exercise. Since its effects are separable, suspension is either: (a) total; or (b) partial. The first deprives a cleric of all rights pertaining to his office as well as his benefice; the second deprives only of the rights pertaining to an office or benefice taken separately, or again only of a certain number of rights either of an office or benefice. This grand division has sub-divisions relating to benefice and office respectively, e.g., suspension from the income of a benefice, or from the ministry of the Sacrament of Penance. Suspension may cease of itself if inflicted conditionally or for a time. Otherwise authorized absolution is necessary for its removal.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine.

Sutton, Sir Richard (d. 1524), English lawyer, who, with Bishop Smyth of Lincoln, built and endowed Brasenose College (1508-1523), and benefited also Corpus Christi College, Oxford, the Temple, and was knighted by Henry VIII.—C.E.

Swan, Order of the, a pious confraternity for nobles founded in Brandenburg in honor of the Blessed Virgin by the Elector Frederick II, 1440. A medal of the Blessed Virgin with a swan attached was worn by members of the order, giving rise to its name. The society ceased to exist with the introduction of Protestantism.—C.E.

Swastika, a cross-shaped emblem of Sanskrit origin. The name signifies “of good omen.” It is sometimes called the crucis gamma, meaning that it resembles four Greek G’s (gamma) joined at their bases. Its form gives the idea of a wind and of life, and thus is symbolic of the sun and of life. —F. E. S.}

Sweden, monarchy of Europe, occupying the eastern side of the Scandinavian Peninsula; area, 173,154 sq. m.; est. pop. (1926), 6,074,368. It is thought that the first Swedish converts to Christianity were Vikings, before the 9th century, who were believed by the Church to be the earliest Christian missionaries to come to Sweden preached there during the 9th century; among them was St. Anschar, a Frank, known as the Apostle of the North. At the beginning of the 11th century, an Anglo-Saxon, Siegfried, baptized members of the royal family; and three kings of that century, Olof, Olaf, and Inge the Elder, were zealous supporters of the Church. There was much hostile resistance by some, however, which made martyrs of several missionaries. Sees were established, of which the first was at Skara during Stenkil’s reign, and there were monasteries with schools and hospitals. In 1152 a national synod convened, presided over by a papal legate. In 1164 the other Swedish sees were made suffragans to the Archdiocese of Upsala. For a few centuries the building and furnishing of Romanesque or Gothic churches was of chief importance in the development of Swedish art. The Brigittine Order was founded by St. Bridget of Sweden in 1346. A century later Archbishop Ulfsson established the first printing-press in Sweden and founded the University of Upsala. The part taken by some of the bishops in political troubles, especially in relation to Denmark and Norway, created factions and won considerable support for King Gustavus Vasa (d. 1560) in his quarrel with the Church. The latter confiscated ecclesiastical property, suppressed monasteries, executed priests and religious, approved the preaching of a pupil of Luther, and made himself head of an independent Swedish church. With brief interruptions this national church has remained Lutheran; at times non-Lutherans were not allowed within the country and many were fined, imprisoned, or executed. In 1780 tolerance began to be established by law, and in 1789 the country, together with Norway, was made a vicariate Apostolic. Until recent times Catholics have suffered many civil disabilities, from which they are not yet entirely free according to the law. Catholic statistics:

Swedish Missionary Church of America, A. 1843 900 40 100,000

Swedish New Church, or Swedenborgian Churches, or CHURCHES OF THE New Jerusalem, a Protestant sect first organized in London, 1787. Their doctrines are based upon the writings of Emanuel Swedenborg. Their first church in America, the New Church, was founded in Baltimore, 1792. Their government is a modified episcopacy, the associated bodies having freedom in the administration of their local affairs. They publish five periodicals. Missionary work is carried on through their Board of Home and Foreign Missions, supplemented by an Augmentation Fund Committee and by local boards. Work has been extended to Germany, France, Switzerland, South Africa, Brazil, and Canada. In 1916 there were 100 stations, with 5 American missionaries and 9 native helpers; 5 organized churches with 310 members; and 3 schools with 35 pupils. In 1925 there were in the Swedenborgian churches 100 ministers, 95 churches, and 6,529 communicants.—C.E.

Swiss Guards, military guards of the Vatican, organized by Julius II, 1510, following an agreement with the Swiss cantons of Zurich and Lucerne to supply a perpetual body-guard to the pope. They guard all entrances and exits to the palace and papal apartments, appear at all pontifical functions, immediately following the Noble Guard in processions, and are granted extensive religious privileges, including their own chapel and chaplain. The uniform of black, red and yellow, designed by Michelangelo, is still worn, sometimes replaced by an undress uniform of steel-blue. Strict requirements govern admission to the Guards.

Swithin (SWITHUN), Saint, confessor (d. 826), Bp. of Winchester, b. probably Wessex, England. He was the trusted councillor of Egbert, King of the West Saxons, by whom he was appointed to the bishopric of Winchester, c. 832. From the first translation of his relics, in 948, to the destruction of the shrine, in 1538, he was patron of Winchester Cathedral.

Syllabus of Pius IX (Gr., collection). This is a series of eighty condemned propositions, formulating the chief errors prevalent in a rationalistic controversy and aimed at undermining religion, morality and society. The syllabus contains excerpts taken from various allocations, encyclicals, and letters of Pius IX and was promulgated, together with the Bull "Quanta Cura," 8 December, 1864. The sense of the propositions must be gathered from those other documents in which the context will give their full condemned meaning; otherwise they can easily be misinterpreted and the condemnation even made ridiculous. For instance, the eightieth proposition: "The Pope may and must reconcile himself with, and adapt himself to progress, liberalism and modern civilization," can only be explained with the help of the papal document "Jam unde Coram," on the understanding that the Holy See has always been the protector and patron of all genuine civilization.—C.E., XIV, 368.

Sylvestrines, minor ordines founded by St. Sylvestrines, on Monte Fano near Fabriano, 1231. They follow the rule of St. Benedict, with special stress on the strictest observance of poverty. The congregation was approved by Innocent IV, 1247, and at the death of St. Sylvestrines, 1207, it numbered 13 monasteries. In 1662, Alexander VII united the order to that of the Vallombrosans, but this union only lasted until 1667. The mother-house is the Roman monastery at San Stefano. Statistics: 8 monasteries, 1 mission in Ceylon, 75 religious.—C.E.

Symbolism may be defined as the investing of outward things or actions with an inner meaning, especially for the expression of religious ideas. To be effective it must appeal to the intelligence of the people by the use of significant acts and objects universally known. The Old Testament is full of symbolism and may be especially seen in the mystery which surrounded the Ark. The persecutions of the early ages of Christianity made it necessary to veil beliefs and practices under figures and emblems. The early ritual of the Church used symbols, such as the white robe of Baptism. Medieval symbolism may have sometimes had a utilitarian character, as in the case of liturgical vestments where symbolic meanings were attached to usages adopted for some practical purpose. But the poetry of the Catholic religion, the beauty and significance of its liturgy, the appeal of its belief and history to the imagination, developed as extraordinary richness of symbolism. Every detail of the structure of a church came to have a special significance. As early as the 4th century the church was built to face the East because there had originated the human race, Christ had lived, and the sun rose, emblematic of Him as Sun of Righteous. Later the west porch was associated with the end of life. Isolated pieces of symbolism are represented by the chrism or monogram of Christ. The earliest representation of the First Person of the Trinity seems to be the Divine hand. Other examples are the conventional emblems of the Four Evangelists from the Apocalypse. The monogram I.H.S. (15th century) represents an abbreviated Greek form of the Holy Name. Symbols inspire devotion, and aid instruction; they are the books of the unlearned, as St. Augustine calls them. —C.E.; Jenner, Christian Symbols, Lond., 1910; Henry, Catholic Customs and Symbols, N. Y., 1923.

Symbolism, name for a religious creed or special profession of faith; the title of the remarkable book by Mohler, comparing the chief Protestant creeds with the Catholic; the subject of Bossuet’s “Variations of Protestant Churches.”

Symbols, in Christian art and architecture, ornamental details emblematic of the truths of religion, of Our Saviour, of His Blessed Mother and the Saints, and of the virtues which our Faith teaches. They are an aid in imparting religious instruction; St. Augustine calls them libri idisatern (books of the unlearned). They have been used since the earliest days of the Church; in the Roman catacombs are rude paintings and carvings, expressing the faith of the primitive Christians. In later ages, ecclesiastical art has used them profusely in the ornamentation of churches, altars, and vestments, and in pictorial windows. Many of them are explained in special articles.—C.E.; Sullivan, Externals of the Catholic Church, N. Y., 1918. (J. F. S.)

Symmachus, Saint, Pope (498-514), b. Sar- dinia; d. Rome. His election was disputed by the Byzantine candidate, the antipope Laurentius. Although he was exonereated of the latter’s charges against him at the Palmary Synod, 502, the quarrel continued for four years. As pope he expelled the Manicheans from Rome; defended the supporters of orthodoxy during the Arian schism; sent money to the African bishops who were being persecuted by the Arian Vandals; and repaired and erected many churches, and asylums for the poor. Feast, 19 July.—C.E.; Butler.

Symphorosa, Saint, martyr (c. 38), d. Tibur (Tivoli), Italy. According to an old Passio, Symphorosa, the widow of the tribe Gethulius, was thrown into the river Anio for refusing to sacrifice to the gods. For the same reason each of her sons suffered a different kind of martyrdom. The diocese of Tivoli honors them as patrons. Relics in S. Angelo in Pescaria at Rome. Feast, R. Cal., 18 July.—C.E.; Butler.

Synagogue, (Gr., synage, to bring together). (1) A local assembly of Jews organized chiefly for public worship. (2) The building or place of assembly used by Jewish communities primarily for religious worship. In N.T. times the synagogue became the central institution of Judaism. Even in the days of Moses there were certain sites where the people assembled for religious worship. The centering of religious worship in Jerusalem did not eliminate these subordinate synagogues. Under David, and by his authority, while the Ark of the Covenant was in Jerusalem, Zadok the priest offered sacrifice at Gibon. The synagogue in the epoch of the Babylonian Captivity was enlarged in its scope and made a permanent institution. For the dispersed Jews a place of common prayer and instruction was necessary. In the succeeding years that necessity was always present, for there were always more Jews of the dispersion than those that dwelt in Jerusalem. The founding therefore of synagogues proceeded side by side with the revival of the temple cult in Jerusalem. In the Talmud mention is made of a Great Synagogue organized by Ezra, of which he was president. In the reorganization of Jewish polity after the return from the captivity it is certain that a council of chief men assisted the chief executive (Matt., 5), but much that is legendary has been written of this council. The spirit of Rabbinism is superstitious and extravagant. The building of synagogues became general. According to Halakah legend there were 394 or 480 synagogues in Jerusalem. This of course is mere fable, but from Acts, 6, we know that the foreign Jews dwelling in Jerusalem had their own synagogues. In the Council at Jerusalem St. James declared that in every city Moses was read in the synagogues. Twelve times in the New Testament the term synagogue is used to denote the body politic of the Jews. In 43 places it means the religious meeting-house of the Jews.—C.E.; Jewish Encyclopedia. (A. E. B.)

Hatred and Malice

Synaxis (Gr., assembly). (1) Meeting for any religious function in the Greek Church, especially the Eucharistic Sacrifice. (2) Title of certain fasts on which people assemble in a harmonious whole. It designates the union of the disunited Cretans against hostile invasion (Plutarch); the fusion of variant pagan religions into one; the attempt in the 16th century, made by George Callistus, to reunite the Lutherans with the Catholic Church. Syncretism applies also to the philosophical and religious systems that grow out of the process of eliminating non-essentials and conserving essentials as a common ground of union. C.E. (A. J. M.)

Syndic, Apostolic (Gr., syndikos, advocate), a procurator, introduced by Innocent IV, 1247, to act in the name of the Holy See as civil administrator of the property in the use of the Friars Minor but belonging to the Holy See, since corporate as well as individual ownership was forbidden to the Friars; largely superseded by temporary dispensations permitting corporate possession according to civil law only.—C.E.; Turner, The Vow of Poverty. Wash., 1928 (s. r. b.)

Syndicalism, a revolutionary working-class movement, aiming at the ownership and control of industry by the workers on a basis of the organization of labor by industries rather than by crafts. As a means to its end it advocates the general strike and sabotage. Its origin dates to 1895 when the Confédération Générale du Travail was formed in France. From France it has extended to Italy, England, and the United States. In former times the words "universal" and "plenary" were used to designate such a synod. The national synod discusses ecclesiastical and mixed matters. The decisions adopted become the law for the entire nation, but first they must be submitted and approved by the Holy See. Even though all the bishops of a nation are not present at a national synod, nevertheless the laws bind the nation. In the United States the national synods are known as Baltimore Councils.—C.E., XIV, 389. (s. v.)

Synoptics (Gr., synopsis, simultaneous view), a term applied to the first three Gospels: Matthew, Mark, Luke. They are so named because, following the same general plan and possessing great similarity in matter and form of narration, they present the same comprehensive view of the Life and Teachings of Jesus Christ.—C.E. (R. F. s.)

Syntagmá (Gr., syntagmo, put in order together), a systematic collection or compilation, more specifically applied to the work of Matthew Blastares in the 14th century, based on the Nomo­canon of Photius and still held in esteem in the Greek schismatic Church.—C.E. (T. K. K.)

Syon Monastery, Middlesex, England, founded, 1415, by King Henry V at his manor of Isleworth. It belonged to the modified order of St. Augustine, confirmed by Martin V, 1418. The community comprised priests, deacons, lay brethren and nuns. Expelled, 1539, the nuns returned under Queen Mary, but were again exiled at her death and settled in Lisbon. The Lisbon community returned to England, 1861, settling at Spettisbury, Dorsetshire (transferred to Chudleigh, Devon, 1887).—C.E.

Syracuse, town on the east coast of Sicily, one of the five Roman colonies situated there, where St. Paul spent three days on his journey to Rome (Acts, 28). Patrons: St. Lucy.

Syracuse, Diocese of, New York; embraces Broome, Chenango, Cortland, Madison, Oneida, Onondaga, and Oswego Counties; area, 5749 sq. m.;
suffragan of New York. Bishops: Patrick A. Ludden (1887-1912); John Grimes (1912-1922); Daniel Joseph Curley (1923). Churches, 157; priests, secular, 192; priests, regular, 22; religious women, 621; academies, 4; high schools, 11; parochial schools, 42; pupils in parochial schools, 17,790; institutions, 14; Catholics, 203,981.

Syrian Rite. I. East, also known as Chaldean, Assyrian, or Persian Rite is used by the following Uniat and non-Uniat groups: Nestorians, Chaldeans or Syro-Chaldeans, and Malabars. They are situated in Mesopotamia, Persia, India, and America. The language of these three forms of the East Syrian liturgy is Syriac or Aramaic. The origin of the rite is unknown but it is considered a development of the Antiochene. As a result of the Nestorian heresy and the Greek Schism these Christians were cut off from the Western Church for centuries. But in 1445 those in Cyprus, in 1599 a group of Malabars, and in 1681 some Chaldeans united themselves with Rome. The manuscripts of this rite date from the 17th and 18th centuries and consist of 10 books. In the case of the Uniat these have been revised and the formulas for the administration of the Sacraments are similar to those of the Latin Rite. The Nestorians have only five sacraments, Penance and Extreme Unction being almost unknown. This liturgy prescribes Communion under both kinds, solemn kneading and baking of the loaves before Mass, and the use of oil in Baptism, Confirmation, the consecration of churches, and the making of bread for the Eucharist.

II. West, used by the following Uniat and non-Uniat groups: Jacobites, Catholic Syrians, and Maronites. It is not the pure Antiochene rite (see Greek Rites) but the later Jerusalem-Antioch or Greek St. James translated into Syriac. Among the Jacobites who are still schismatic, this liturgy is interspersed with many Arabic prayers, Baptism is performed by immersion and confession has fallen into decay as in most non-Uniat Churches. When some of these people joined Rome in 1781 and became known as Catholic Syrians, this rite was examined and revised, and from the mass of Anaphoras or Canons, which are said by one authority to number 64, seven were selected and are now celebrated. A Romanized adaptation of this liturgy is in use among the Maronites.

Tabernacle. Our word tabernacle, as designating the portable sanctuary of the Hebrews in the desert, stands for two Hebrew terms signifying respectively, "dwelling," and "tent." These clearly point out the nature and shape of the tabernacle proper (that is, exclusive of the surrounding court); it is the "dwelling" of the Most High, and covered as a "tent." The walls of the "dwelling" on three sides, N., W., and S., were made of 48 gilded planks of sycamore-wood, 10 cubits long and 1½ cubits wide, sunk in sockets at the bottom and joined together by tenons and cross-bars so as to enclose an area of approximately 30 × 10 cubits. The exact shape and arrangement of these boards is a great problem of exegesis, the solution of which depends upon the meaning of a few technical terms. The ceiling consisted of two draperies, each made up of five pieces of linen, 28 × 4 cubits, woven on a corporal; it is forbidden to keep in it anything else, e.g., relics, or the holy oils. Flowers, etc., should not be placed on the altar before the tabernacle; nothing should be put above it save the sacred linen (without the cherubimic design, however), hanging by golden hooks from five gilded posts of sycamore-wood.—C.E.

Tabernacle (Lat., tabernaculum, tent), a cupboard or closet for the reservation of the vessels containing the Blessed Sacrament. In the early days of Christianity persecution rendered the reservation of the consecrated species impossible except in the homes of the faithful. Beginning with the 4th century, however, the Blessed Sacrament was kept in the churches. For centuries there was no uniformity of practise in the manner of reserving the Holy Eucharist. Sometimes it was enclosed in a dove-shaped receptacle suspended before the altar (as is customary today in some Greek churches); sometimes it was kept in a "sacrament-house," projecting from the wall of the sanctuary; sometimes the place of reservation was the sacristy. From the 10th century the custom became common (and is now of obligation in the Latin Church) of reserving the Blessed Sacrament in a tabernacle set in the middle of the altar. According to ecclesiastical legislation, the tabernacle should be solidly built, and gilded-plated within, or lined with white silk. It should be kept locked, and the key deposited in a safe place, in the care of a priest. In the tabernacle the sacred vessels should rest on a corporal; it is forbidden to keep in it anything else, e.g., relics, or the holy oils. Flowers, etc., should not be placed on the altar before the tabernacle: nothing should be put above it save the crucifix. The tabernacle is to be blessed before use.—C.E.; P.C. Augustiné, Wuest, tr. Mullaney, Matters Liturgical, N. Y., 1925. (E. J. O'C.)

Tabernacles, Feast of (Gr. skenopegia, pitching of the tent), one of the three great feasts of the Hebrews (2 Mac., 1). It recalls the custom established by the law of Leviticus, 23, of erecting booths on the roofs of houses, and in the streets, booths of branches and foliage, wherein all who could were obliged to live during the feast, which began on the 15th day of the 7th month (about our September), and lasted seven days. Its character was one of joy and merriment (Ps., 4), and every male Israelite was obliged to go to Jerusalem for the celebration. It had a beneficial influence socially, as the distinctions between rich and poor were forgotten for the time being. One of the features was to offer thanksgiving for the crops of the year (Deut., 16), but to the Jews it was primarily a commemoration of their fathers' dwelling in tents in the wilderness (Lev., 23); and a thanksgiving for the abode given them in the Promised Land, and, after the erection of the Temple, for a permanent place of worship (3 K., 8).—C.E.

of the Blessed Sacrament and of Work for Poor Churches, founded at Brussels, 1848, by Anne de Memain. The members pledge themselves to spend an hour each month before the Blessed Sacrament, and to contribute to the support of poor churches. Vestments are made by the women members, for needy priests. The Congregation of Apostles of Perpetual Adoration grew out of the Brussels association, which became an archconfraternity for Belgium in 1853, and quickly spread to the nearby countries. Tabernacle societies are now organized throughout Europe and the United States, and have done great work for the mission fields.—C.E.

Tablet, The, official organ of the Diocese of Brooklyn; published weekly in Brooklyn, N. Y. by the Tablet Publishing Co., Inc.; founded, 1908; circulation, 46,819.

Tablet, The, Great Britain's oldest Catholic weekly, founded 16 May, 1840, by Frederic Lucas, later M.P. for Meath. At one time divided into two separate publications: "The Tablet," and "The True Tablet," it was published as "The Tablet" for several years after 1849 in Ireland, being again issued from London (1853), and thereafter successively edited by John Wallis (1855-68), Herbert Cardinal Vaughan (1868-84), J. G. Sneed-Cox (1884-1920), J. B. Milburn (1920-23), and the present editor, Ernest Oldmeadow (1923). (E. Y.)

Tabora, the official organ of the Diocese of Tallaght Monastery, Uppercross, Dublin, founded by St. Macrulinus (d. 792). It was united to the Archdiocese of Dublin by Alexander III, 1179, and annexed to St. Patrick's Cathedral, 1223. It passed into Protestant hands at the Reformation. In 1842 the Dominicans erected a novitiate and church there.

Talleyrand-Périgord, Charles Maurice de (1754-1838), minister and ambassador, b. Paris; d. there. Educated for the Church, he became abbé, and in 1780 Bp. of Autun. A member of the Constitutional Committee, he extolled the spoliation of the clergy, took oath to the Civil Constitution and was excommunicated, 1791. As minister of affairs under Napoleon, and again under Louis XVIII he preserved the integrity of France, and was for a while ambassador to England.—C.E.

Tallis, Thomas (c. 1564-83), composer, b. and d. probably London. That he attended St. Paul's Cathedral as a chorister under Thomas Maitland is a matter of conjecture. Organist of Waltham Abbey, 1536-40, he became a gentleman of the Chapel Royal, 1542, and retained that appointment under Elizabeth, despite his avowed Catholicity. He shared with Byrd the monopoly of music-printing for twenty-one years. His contrapuntal work has been compared to that of Palestrina. He composed a Dorian service, a five-part Litany, "Lamentations," and "Salve Intemerata" Mass.—C.E.

Talmud (late Heb., talmud, instruction), a compilation (c. a.d. 130) consisting of the Mishna, i.e., the codification of Jewish religious and legal principles, additional to and developed from the Pentateuch, and the Genara, a collection of discussions and explanations, commentary upon and concerning the Mishna. It was the result of the Talmud, collection of many successive labors; a tradition, transmitted orally for centuries that was finally put into definite literary form. As the work was begun simultaneously in Babylon and Palestine, there are two versions, the Babylonian and the Palestinian.—C.E.

TASCHEREAU

was named archbishop, 1871, and cardinal, 1886. He founded the Sacred Heart Hospital, and put the shrine of St. Anne de Beaupre and St. Patrick's parish in the charge of the Redemptorists.—C.E.

Tasse, Joseph (1848-95), writer and journalist, b. Montreal. He was editor of "La Minerve" (1869-72), member of the House of Commons for the city of Ottawa and of the Senate. In addition to contributions to "La Revue Canadienne" and historical articles presented to the Royal Society of Canada, he wrote "Les Canadiens de l'Ouest."—C.E.

Tasso, Torquato (1544-95), poet, b. Sorrento, Italy; d. Rome. Educated at Urbino, Venice, and the University of Padua, he settled at Ferrara in the suite of Card. Louis d'Estree. Clouded in mind, he spent seven years in an insane asylum; but he was about to be crowned poet laureate in Rome when he died. He was the author of "Rinaldo" (1562), "Jerusalem Delivered," revised later as "Jerusalem Conquered," an inferior work, and "Aminta," a pastoral idyl.—C.E.; Boulting, Tasso and His Time, Lond., 1907.

Tatian, a 2nd-century apologist, b. probably Assyria. He was trained in Greek philosophy, became a Christian c. 150, but apostatized later and returned to the Orient as a Gnostic of the Encratite sect. His extant works are: "Oratio ad Graecos," an apology for Christianity, and "Diatesseron," a harmony of the four Gospels, the only Gospel text used in Syria in the 3rd and 4th centuries.—C.E.

Taverner, John (c. 1475-c. 1536), composer, b. Boston, England; d. there. He was educated at Cologne, lived at Basel where he was the center of a society called the Friends of God of Basel, and preached at Strasbourg. His sermons are among the monuments of the German language, and are of profound spiritual meaning.—C.E.

Te Deum laudamus: te Dominum confitemur, or, When thou dost pray thy mighty prayer, hymn for Lauds on 20 October, feast of St. John Cantius. It is not known who the author was, but it was written in the 16th century. There are five translations, the English title given is by J. M. Hunter-Blair.—Britt.

Taverne, Joseph (1300-61), Dominican, mystic and preacher of the Middle Ages, b. Strasbourg; d. there. He was educated at Cologne, lived at Basel where he was the center of a society called the Friends of God of Basel, and preached at Strasbourg. His sermons are among the monuments of the German language, and are of profound spiritual meaning.—C.E.

Taxa Innocentiana, an instruction issued by Innocent XI (8 Oct., 1678), ordaining that all diocesan chantries, according to the decree of Council of Trent, should grant dispensations and execute rescripts free of charge, yet allowing them to accept a modest contribution or tax for the necessary chantry expenses. This tax for various acts was determined by the pope in this instruction. But in the course of time other enactments in this matter emanated from Rome, and now according to can. 1507, these taxes are to be determined by a Provincial Council.—C.E. (W. J. M.)

Taylor, Frances Margaret (Mother M. Magdalen Taylor; 1832-1900), Superior General and foundress of the Poor Servants of the Mother of God. A nurse on Florence Nightingale's staff in the Crimean War, she was converted and upon her return to England worked among the poor with Lady Georgiana Fullerton. She contributed extensively to Catholic periodicals.—C.E.

Tears, a word frequently used in Scripture to express: affliction, "This earth is a valley of tears" (Ps. 88); earnestness in prayer, "began to pray with tears" (Tob., 3); great sorrow, "Who will give... a fountain of tears to my eyes?" (Jer. 9), Christ "in the days of His flesh, with a strong cry and tears, offering up prayers... was heard for His reverence" (Heb., 5); repentance, as David's, "I will wash my couch with my tears" (Ps. 6). Spiritual writers speak of the gift of tears as a special blessing.

Te deprecante, corporum, or, When thou dost pray thy mighty prayer, hymn for Matins on solemn occasions. It was probably written by St. Nicetas (335-415), and has several prose translations besides about 25 metrical ones.—Britt.

Te dicimus præconio, or, O Virgin Mother of our God, hymn for Matins on 11 February, feast of the Apparition of the Blessed Virgin. It is not known when or by whom it was written. The translation given is by Abp. Bagshawe.—Britt.

Te dicimus præconio, or, O Virgin Mother of our God, hymn for Matins on 11 February, feast of the Apparition of the Blessed Virgin. It is not known when or by whom it was written. The translation given is by Abp. Bagshawe.—Britt.

Te gestientem gaudii, or, The gladness of thy Motherhood, hymn for Vespers (II) on 7 Oct., feast of the Holy Rosary. It was written by A. Ricchini who lived in the 18th century. Of the five translations, the English title given is by D. A. Potter.—Britt.

Te, Joseph, celebrent aegmina caelitum, or, Let angels chant thy praise, pure spouse of purest Bride, hymn for Vespers on 19 March, feast of St. Joseph. It is also used in the Office of the Solemnity of St. Joseph, observed on the Wednesday before the third Sunday after Easter. It was written in the 17th century, but it is not known by whom. Seven translations are in existence; the English title given is by T. Potter.—Britt.

Tekakwitha (Taketwe, Tekatekwe, Tekawhaw, Tekakehaw, Tekake-keha, Tekakekehawa, or Tekakwitha), Catherine (1656-80), the "Lily of the Mohawks," an Indian virgin of the Mohawk tribe, b. Aniessville, New York, lived at Fonda nearby; d. Caughnawaga, Canada. She was instructed by Jesuit missionaries in 1667 and later baptized. Going to the reservation for Christian Indians at Caughnawaga, she lived with a Christian squaw a life of extraordinary sanctity. The reservation attributes the loyalty of its inhabitants to her patronage. The cause of her beatification is in process.—C.E.

Tel-el-Amarna Tablets, so called from the present name of the city of ancient Egypt, Akhetaton, between Memphis and Thebes. They are in clay, 352 in number, and were found in 1857. They record conditions in Western Asia from 1500 to 1300 B.C. and confirm much that is contained in the Bible.—C.E.

Teleology (Gr., teles, end; logos, science) means the doctrine that there is design, purpose, or finality in the world, that effects are in some way intentional, and that no complete account of the universe is possible without reference to final causes.—C.E.

Telesphorus, Saint, Pope (c. 125-c. 136). He is mentioned as always celebrating Easter on Sunday, without abandoning Church fellowship with those communities that did not follow this custom. Feast, R. Cal., 5 Jan.—C.E.; Butler.

Telluris alme Conditor, or, Earth's Mighty Maker, whose command, hymn for Vespers on Tuesday. It was written probably by Pope St. Gregory the Great (540-604). There are 20 translations; the English title given is an anonymous one taken from the "Hymnal Noted."—Britt.

Te lucis ante terminum, or, Before the Ending of the Day, hymn for Compline throughout the year; Ambrosian school, 7th century. It has 35 translations; the English title given is by J. Neale.—C.E.; Britt.

Temperance is one of the four cardinal virtues. It is the righteous habit which makes a man govern his natural appetite for pleasures of the senses in accordance with the norm prescribed by reason. It bridges concupiscence and has for subordinate virtues: abstemiousness, chastity, and modesty. It imposes moderation and self-control in the use of food, drink, and sexual gratification.—C.E.; Rickaby, Ethics and Natural Law, Lond., 1908.

Temperance Movements, Catholic. Temperance means moderation, and strictly speaking, has to do with every virtue. In popular parlance, however, it has come to be applied solely to the use of alcoholic liquors. The Church has always advocated moderation in the use of liquors, as well as other things, and it was not until the beginning of the 19th century that the movement started to found societies and organizations to foster sobriety. The chief impetus seems to have come from the United States. A temperance society existed as early as 1808 at Saratoga, New York, and another in 1815 in Massachusetts. The movement spread to Europe and made its first appearance in Ireland in 1818 at Skibbereen. The cause was taken up by Father Theobald Mathew of Cork in 1834, and within ten years he had more than 5,500,000 followers. He journeyed over England, Scotland, and America, leaving temperance societies in his wake everywhere. In Germany we find eight convents as Fr. Schaffranek, Fr. Ketterer, S.J. The influence was felt also in Holland, Denmark, and Scandinavia. The success of the movement was hurt by the fact that temperance soon began to mean "teetotalism" which may be a virtue for a few but must not be forced as such upon the majority. Consequently the great temperance societies which sprung up did so under non-Catholic auspices, and we find the Church dealing with the problem in a more personal manner through the relations of the priest and his people. It would seem as if the Church foresaw the extremes into which the movement would pass, and withdrew before fanaticism would bring to pass such encroachments upon personal liberty as the Prohibition movement.—C.E. (A. O'B.)

Templars, Knights, The, military order founded, 1118, by Hugues de Payens and eight companions, to defend Jerusalem. Baldwin II assigned them quarters in the palace adjoining the Temple, and in 1128 they were formally approved by the Church. Following the Benedictine Rule, they took the three vows of religion as well as the Crusader's vow, adopted the white Cistercian habit with a red cross added, and were under the immediate jurisdiction of the pope. Standing for the two great passions of the time, religious fervor and military prowess, recruits flocked to their standard. Dauntless fighters, they are described by a contemporary as "pious monks in the chapel; formidable to the enemies of Christ, gentleness itself to His friends." At the siege of Safed (1264), besides the 90 Templars killed, 80 were taken prisoners, and upon refusal to apostatize, died martyrs. In less than two centuries over 20,000 Templars died in battle. Difficulties with the government, however, as well as internal dissensions, caused a wave of unpopularity of which Philip the Fair availed himself to organize a crusade against them. By intrigue Clement V's approval was gained and the Knights were tried for heresy and sacrilege, many pleading guilty after severe torture. The pope annulled the trial, but later ordered a second one before a papal commission; persuaded of individual irregularities, he finally decreed dissolution of the order without condemnation, 1312.—C.E.

Temple (Lat., templum) originally signified an area marked off by boundaries, especially a place marked off by augurs to be exempt from all profane uses. The Indo-Germanic peoples originally worshipped without temples, upon mountains. It was probably through Oriental influence that the Greeks and Romans came to worship in temples.
The temple was built preferably on a high open space, and nothing impure could enter the precincts. In front was the sacrificial altar. The most sacred part contained the image of the god. One class was for the worship of some god, another for use in chapel connection with the games, and a third for the celebration of the mysteries. The temple served as a treasury, as a place for votive offerings, and as an asylum for malefactors. The Egyptian temple was a group of buildings fitted one into the other and surrounded by a wall. Through the gigantic pylon the sacred precincts were entered. The lower classes were confined to the open quadrangular peristyle, the enlightened might proceed to the colonnaded hypostyle. The small dark sanctuary was at the end. The Chaldean temples were constructed so as to form a series of terraces in the shape of a pyramid with a broad base, topped by the sanctuary. The Indian temples were grottoes or caves hewn from the rock. The Buddhist temples were cut away from the main mass and was quadrangular in form, with an apse. The Greek temples consisted of the cela, containing the statue of the god, the vestibule in front, and a portico behind. Later the peristyle surrounded the outside. Their beauty was in the harmony of parts and careful execution. Roman temples were larger and more ostentations, and preferably round in form. Temples served as an abode for the god, not as a house of prayer. Public worship gave a new character to Christian worship and made temple architecture unsuitable.—C.E.

Temple of Jerusalem.
The word "temple," in the Bible, stands sometimes for all the sacred inclosure, containing the "house of God" and the courts surrounding it with all their appurtenances; sometimes only for the "house" proper. Our word temple has to do duty for both meanings, whereas in Hebrew and Greek the distinction is made clear by the use of two different terms.

Solomon's Temple. After the capture of Jerusalem it was natural that the political capital of the kingdom should become likewise its religious center. Thither accordingly David solemnly transferred the Ark of the Covenant, from Carithathammer, and before long he resolved to house it in a temple worthy of the Lord's majesty, on the spot hallowed by the apparition of an angel. God's good pleasure, however, was that not he, with his hands stained by the blood of many battles, but his son, should be the builder. As for himself, he must be content with gathering materials and money for the undertaking. The work was inaugurated in the 4th year of Solomon's reign (c. 968 B.C.), and the house was erected just west of the conspicuous rock overlooking the threshing-floor of Arauna purchased by David, a short distance north of the city. The building, apparently Phenician in design, faced the east. In front of and contiguous with it rose the porch, 20 cubits (most likely the "royal cubit," 20.51 in. or 521.14 cm) broad, 30 high, and 10 deep. On either side towered two huge brazen pillars, Booz and Jachin, by the use of two different terms.

HEROD'S TEMPLE. Such as it was, however, and with occasional repairs, as those executed by the high priest Simon, son of Onias, this second Temple remained standing until 19 B.C., when Herod the Great, as part of his grand scheme of construction to adorn his capital, undertook the erection of a new sanctuary. The outer court was enlarged to twice the original size and surrounded by porticoes; two rows of white marble monolithic columns supported the roofs of carved cedar beams on the east (the so-called Solomon's Porch), north, and west sides; the south portico (royal Porch) consisted of 102 columns forming three aisles, 30, 45, and 30 feet wide. Inside this outer court and on a higher level was the inner court, surrounded by porticoes like the other, and including the women's, the Israelites', and the priests' courts, and the house. This inner court was reached through nine gates, of which that on the east was probably the “Gate Beautiful” of the N.T.; it was 56 cubits high, and 40 broad, and made of Corinthian brass. The house was raised 12 steps above the court of the priests; it measured 60 cubits in length or 20 in width, and 60 in height, and was divided, according to custom, into a “holy place,” containing the altar of incense, the table for the loaves of proposition, and the seven-branched candlestick; and the “holy of holies,” without any furniture whatsoever. A heavy veil closed the entrance of the outer room, and another that of the inner room. A porch 100 cubits high, 100 broad, and 11 deep, with an entrance 40 cubits high, and 20 wide, formed the façade of the building in front of the “holy place.”

The construction of the house was completed in eighteen months; eight years were necessary to do the main work on the surrounding buildings; and the finishing of the details and ornamentation went on for many years, so that the whole structure, the unrivaled magnificence of which is attested by all contemporary writers, was not completed until A.D. 63. Only a few years later, contrary to the wishes of Titius, who desired to preserve the monument, but in providential fulfillment of the prophecy of Our Lord, a Roman soldier threw a firebrand into the house, which was then burned to the ground (A.D. 70). —C.E. Temple of the Holy Ghost. That the just man is a sanctuary or living temple in which the Holy Ghost dwells, is stated by St. Paul in 1 Cor., 3: “You are the temple of God, and the Spirit of God dwelleth in you. But if any man violate the temple of God, him will God destroy. For the temple of God is holy, which you are.” And in 1 Cor., 6: “Your members are the temple of the Holy Ghost, whom in you, whom you have from God. . . . Glorify and bear God in your body.” The words “one body and one Spirit” indicate that the Spirit dwells especially in Christ, and all just are members of Christ’s mystical body. Christ said that all Three Persons of the Trinity abide in the soul of the just (John, 14), though this Divine indwelling is ascribed especially to the Spirit of love and holiness.—Mar­mion, Christ the Life of the Soul, St. L., 1922. (C. F. C.)

Temporal Power (Lat., tempus, time), the rule of the Church in earthly possessions and causes of temporal interest, as differing from its rule in spiritual matters; the spiritual body, the mystical body over the civil territories once belonging to the Church, the Papal States; the same authority, since the Lateran Treaty, 11 February, 1929, over the Vatican City or State.—Berry, The Church of Christ, St. L., 1927. (Ed.)

Temporal Punishment, a limited penalty incurred for sin. It may be remitted in this life; if not remitted, it must be satisfied either in this world or in the next (Trent, sess. VI). (A. C.)

Temptation is a solicitation to sin, whether by persuasion or by the offer of some pleasure. It arises sometimes from the propensity to evil inherent in us as a result of original sin; sometimes it comes from the devil, who places alluring of the tempter. Temptation is not in itself sin. Attack is not synonymous with surrender. No matter how strong the inclination to transgress the law of God and the law of the will, there is no sin. Merit is won by resistance. —C.E. Temptation. According to Mark, 1, and Luke, 4 (in the Greek text), Our Lord was tempted during the whole period of forty days that He remained in the desert; whereas, according to Matthew, 4, it was only at the end of this period. Probably the three temptations, mentioned in detail by Matthew and Luke, were the final assaults. The devil conjured the whole programme of the false Messianic dream of the Jews, the earthly concept of the temporal kingdom they looked for, owing to their one-sided interpretation of the Messianic prophecies. But Christ, having come to do the will of His Father, does not hesitate for a moment. The cross, not the crown, is His choice. but tempted outwardly, by an imagery and eloquence appealing most strikingly to the senses, yet without the possibility of such attractions vanquishing His soul or staining it. "Christ was tempted," says St. Augustine, "lest the Christian should be vanquished by the Tempter."—C.E.; Le Camus, tr. Hickey, The Life of Christ, N. Y., 1906. (J. M. R.)

Ten Commandments of God, or Decalogue (Gr., deka, ten; logos, word), the ten words or sayings; ten precepts bearing on the fundamental obligations of religion and morality, and embodying the revealed expression of the Creator's will in relation to man's whole duty to God and to his fellow-creatures. Written by God on two tables of stone, they were given directly to Moses on Mount Sinai, and by him made the ground-work of the Mosaic Law (Ex., 20; Deut., 5). The first three concern our love and worship of God; the others, our love of our neighbor and the justice due him.—C.E., IV, 153.

Tenebrae (Lat., darkness), the public chanting of a part of the Divine Office, taking place on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday of Holy Week, the "anticipated" Matins and Lauds of Holy Thurs­day, Good Friday, and Holy Satur­day. It contains passages or "les­sons" from the Lamentations of the Prophet Jeremias, chanted to a beautiful and most mournful tune. The service takes its name from a symbolic ceremony, the gradual extinguishing of candles till one only remains lighted; this is hidden for a time behind the altar, and is then brought forth, a symbol of the Risen Saviour. The candles number 15, because one of them is to be extinguished at the end of each of the 14 psalms of the Office, and one is to remain lighted. The triangular candlestick was called, in the Middle Ages, a "harrow," from its shape.—C.E.; Guéranger, tr. Shepherd, The Liturgical Year: Passiontide and Holy Week, Lond., 1886. (J. F. S.)

Catholic influence on the place-names of the state is shown in the erection of St. Claire, St. Joseph. The U. S. Religious Census of 1916 gave the following statistics for church membership in Tennessee:

Teresa of Avila, Old Castile; d. Alba de Tormes. In 1535 she entered the Carmelites Convent of the Incarnation at Avila, the Letters of St. Jerome having in­duced her to embrace the religious life, and made her profession, 1534. Her mystical powers reached a high point, and she was favored with extraordinary graces and visions, among others the transverberation, or piercing, of her heart with a golden arrow. She became associated with St. Francis Borgia and St. Peter of Alcantara, who discerned in her spiritual experiences the special favor of God. In 1562 she founded at Avila the first convent of the Discalced Carmelite Nuns of the Primitive Rule of St. Joseph; in spite of diffi-
The bodies were thrown into a sandpit with those of 1298 other victims, beatified, 1906.—C.E.

Tertullian (Quintus Septimius Florens Tertullianus) (b. 160), ecclesiastical writer, b. Carthage. He was converted from Paganism to Christianity, and wrote “To the Nations,” a refutation of calumnies against Christians; “Apology”; “Against Heretics”; and manuals and discipline of the Church. His rigorist or puritanical disposition led him, c. 211, to join the heretical Phrygians or Montanists, named after their originator, Montanus, who, claiming to be a prophet, with two prophetesses, Maximilla and Priscilla, advocated extravagant observances with regard to fasting, continence, and quarterly fasting.

Te splendor et virtus Patris, or, O JESU! LIFE-SPRING OF THE SOUL! Hymn for Vespers and Matins on the feast of St. Michael the Archangel, 29 Sept. It is attributed to Rabanus Maurus (776-856). There are 18 translations; the English title given is by E. Caswall.—Brit.

Testament, Old and New. The word Testament in the Greek vernacular is the equivalent of last will and testament, but, in the language of the Septuagint and the New Testament generally, it serves in the sense of covenant or compact between God and man (Ex., 30; Num., 14; Matt., 26). The Hebrew Scriptures, as the record containing the agreement between God and Abraham on the moral and Moses, came by metonymy to be known in Greek-speaking circles as diatheke, testament. When the further revelation came, the final pact between God and His creatures, sealed in the way of earlier covenants, by the blood of a victim, Jesus Christ, it became necessary to distinguish between the collection of early documents referring to this, and those which testified to the earlier covenant which was superseded, but still held in remembrance and regard. This was done by appending to the latter the restricting adjective “old” and, to the former, the antiquated restriction “new,” that is, new as regards man’s knowledge of it.—C.E.; Gramann; Salmon, Introduction to the New Testament, Lond., 1904.

Tetzel, Johann (1456-1519), opponent of Luther, b. Pirna, Meissen; d. Leipzig. Entering the Dominican order c. 1490, he became prior of Glogau in the Polish province, and Inquisitor for Poland. He made his first appearance as a preacher of indulgences, 1503, and in 1509 he indulgence controversy at Strasburg, going thence to Nuremberg, Würzburg, and Bamberg. For the next 6 years nothing is known of him; his appearance as indulgence preacher, 1516, to aid the construction of St. Peter’s, Rome, thrust him into undue prominence and importance, and brought upon him unmerited odium, which painstaking scholarship is slowly removing. He was at Brandenburg prior to Luther’s publication of the 95 theses on the subject of indulgences, 1517, and drew up 106 theses in reply to Luther, 1518, having in the meantime received a doctorate from Frankfurt University. His teachings on indulgences for the living were orthodox, but his views on indulgences for the dead were censured by Cardinal Cajetan, 1517-19, and others. Milititz, sent from Rome, 1518, severely rebuked him, and, in popular disgrace, he retired, broken, to Leipzig, convent where he died, receiving honorable burial. The researches of Dr. Nicholas Paulus have cleared Tetzel of much misrepresentation and derogatory legend; modern historians have also cleared him of the accusation of moral laxity.—C.E.

Teutonic Order, military order of Hospitallers, founded in Acre, 1190, by German pilgrims. Forced to leave Palestine, 1291, they resided in Venice until Conrad of Masovia invited them to conquer and Christianize the pagans of Prussia; in return they were offered Culm and any conquered territory. The Grand Master moved to Marienburg, 1309, was made a prince of the empire, and after a twenty-five years' struggle ruled supreme over an important state, nucleus of the later Prussia. Conflict with the kings of Poland caused a gradual decline, culminating in the loss of Prussia; the order continued in Germany, however, until 1809, when it lost its last possessions, leaving only the bailiwicks in Austria, where it still exists, having resumed its original character. There is a Protestant branch in Utrecht.—C.E.

Tewkesbury Abbey, Gloucestershire, England. In the 8th century the Dukes of Mercia dedicated a monastery to the memory of Theoc, a hermit, which became independent, 1103. The magnificent church was completed and consecrated, 1123. Under John Wakeman, abbot, it was confiscated by Henry VIII; in its place was built the church of San Fernando was begun, a part of which still exists in the sanctuary of the cathedral of San Fernando in San Antonio. In 1728 Mexico ordered the secularization of the missions, and orders of the Spanish Cortes in 1813 led to their final suppression. By 1830 there were priests caring for the Irish settlements at Refugio and San Patricio on the Nueces, the pioneers being Rev. Henry Doyle and Rev. Michael Muldoon. Included in the state are the Archdiocese of San Antonio and the Dioceses of Amarillo, Corpus Christi, Dallas, Galveston, and part of El Paso (qq.v.). Catholic influence on the place-names of the state is shown in the following: San Saba, Concepcion, Corpus Christi, Guadalupe, Mercedes, Nazareth, St. Hedwig, St. Joseph, St. Paul, San Angelo, San Antonio, San Benito, San Diego, San Elizario, San Felipe, San Gabriel, San Jacinto, San Juan, San Leon, San Manuel, San Marcos, San Patricio, San Ygnacio, Santa Anna, Santa Cruz, Santa Maria, Santa Rosa, Trinidad, Trinity. The U. S. Religious Census of 1916 gave the following statistics for church membership in Texas:

Texas though not as famous as those of California were equally important in the Christianizing and civilizing of the Indians. Antedating them, as practically the first missionaries of the region, were priests who accompanied La Salle in 1685 when he made a settlement on Matagorda Bay, giving it the name of Fort St. Louis. Here for two years the Recollects, Fr. Zenobius Membre and Fr. Maximus Le Clercq, and the Sulpician, Fr. Chefcleville, labored until after La Salle’s departure and death, when they were massacred by the Indians. They were the first of the list of Texas martyrs, to which must be added the names of the Franciscans, José Pita (1721), José Guzmanal (1752), Alonzo Ferreros and José San Esteban (1758). In 1689 the first of the Franciscans, Fr. Damian Mazanet and four others from the Mexican college of Queretaro came, accompanying the expedition of Don Alonso de Leon. They founded on the Trinity River the first mission, that of San Francisco de los Tejas. In 1703 occurred the first foundation, on the Rio Grande, of the Mission of San Francisco de Solano, several times removed and renamed, and finally rebuilt in 1744 as the now famous Alamo. After 1714, under the Duke of Linares as viceroy, the missions flourished, especially with the arrival in 1717 of the tireless apostle, Fr. Antonio Margil, of the college of Zacatecas, who personally founded six missions in northeastern Texas, including those of Nuestra Señora de los Dolores, and of Our Lady of Guadalupe, near Nauglochus. Most of the missions established by him and his associates or followers were grouped about the present San Antonio, first called San Fernando. In 1728 the king of Spain settled there a colony of Spaniards from the Canary Islands. They had a chapel in 1732, and by 1744 the church of San Fernando was begun, a part of which still exists in the sanctuary of the cathedral of San Fernando in San Antonio. In 1793 Mexico ordered the secularization of the missions, and orders of the Spanish Cortes in 1813 led to their final suppression. By 1830 there were priests caring for the Irish settlements at Refugio and San Patricio on the Nueces, the pioneers being Rev. Henry Doyle and Rev. Michael Muldoon. Thais (Thaissis or Thaistiis), Saint, penitent, d. Egypt, 548. According to legend, she led an evil life in Egypt, was converted probably by St. Paphnutius, brought to a convent, and allotted a cell as a penitent. After 3 years, she was placed among the nuns, but lived only 14 days. Her cult began in the west in the 6th century. Represented burning her treasures and ornaments, or praying in a cell. Feast, 8 Oct.—C.E.; Butler.

The giving of thanks for favors received. (1) The giving of thanks for favors received. (2) One of the four ends of the Sacrifice of the Mass, specially expressed in the Preface; as God is the giver of all natural and supernatural gifts, we owe Him... an obligation of gratitude, and this obligation is best paid through the Mass.

Thanksgiving Day, in the United States, an annual holiday which originated in the persistent propaganda of Sarah Buell Hale (1788-1879). The President invites the nation to devote the last Thursday in November to thanksgiving to God. It is erroneously thought that the idea originated with the Puritans, who made an effort to supplant Christmas by a thanksgiving day. Thanksgiving days long antedated the Puritans. It is also erroneously stated that the Catholic Church first approved the holiday in 1880. The Catholic Church always approved thanksgiving. The first American national Thanksgiving Day was appointed by Washington, on the recommendation of Congress, after the adoption of the Constitution. Since then, often at long intervals, there have been other such calls to thanksgiving. The annual observance goes back to further than Grant. Besides the proclamation by the President, it has become customary for Governors of states also to issue one.—C.E.

Thayer, John (1755-1815), first native priest of New England, b. Boston; d. Limerick, Ireland. Educated at Yale, he became a Congregational minister and served as chaplain during the Revolutionary War. After his conversion at Rome, he studied under the Sulpicians at Paris, was ordained and returned to Boston, thence to Alexandria, Va., and later to Kentucky, as a missionary. The last years of his life were spent in Limerick.—C.E.

Theater, Morality of the. The general tone of gross indecency prevalent in the theater justified the condemnation that it received from the early Christian writers. In Rome itself under the Empire the legal status of an actor was low, and the Theodosian Code, c. 395, forbade plays on days of special sanctity. St. Augustine, 354-430, made a distinction between the indecencies of the mimes and the elevating influence of the classics. A pure and wholesome form of the drama arose in reverent imitation of the ceremonies of the Mass, and was fostered by the guilds and the religious orders, especially the Jesuits. The problem of bettering the moral tone of the theater is one of the objects of such organizations as the Catholic Actors’ Guild of America and the Catholic Theater Movement (q.v.), and the Catholic Stage Guild (q.v.) in England. Their members cooperate with the clergy in trying to make both actors and producers aware of the moral obligation not to offend decency and virtue. —C.E.

Theban Legion. According to legend, this legion, in the time of Maximinianus, refused to punish Christians in the region of Agaunum (St. Maurice-en-Valais), Switzerland, and consequently was massacred. The principal source of the legend is a letter of St. Eucherius, Bishop of Lyons, written in 450; there are also two editions of “Acts” of these martyrs, and entries in calendars and martyrologies. Attention was first called to the massacre in the episcopate of Theodore of Octodurum (369-91). It was generally accepted as a fact until the 16th century, but since has been the subject of controversy on account of the paucity of reliable sources.—C.E., I, 205.

Thébaud, Augustus (1807-85), educator and publicist, b. Nantes, France; d. Fordham, N. Y. He entered the Society of Jesus, 1835, studied at the Sorbonne and in the United States, where he taught at St. Mary’s College, Kentucky, and St. John’s, Fordham, being the first Jesuit president of the latter. He served at various times as pastor in Troy, Hudson City, and New York. He wrote the “Irish Race, Past and Present,” “The Church and the Moral World,” and “The Church and the Gentile World.”

Thebes, Diocese of (Coptic Rite), Eastern Egypt; established 1805; suffragan of Alexandria. Bishops: Ignace Gladès-Barzi (1896-1926); Marc Kouzam (1926). Residence at Tahtah. Churches, 28; priests, 36; schools, 36; Catholics, 15,000.

Thecla, Saint, virgin, protomartyr among women, b. Nantes, France; d. Isauria and in the church of St. Thecla, DIOCESE OF (Coptic Rite), Eastern Egypt; established 1895; suffragan of Alexandria. Churches, 28; priests, 36; schools, 36; Catholics, 15,000.

Theft, the act of stealing; the covert taking of property which the rightful owner is unwilling to allow. The essential element for the notion of theft is the unwillingness of the owner to part with what is rightfully his. Consequently, there is no theft if the owner agree, or if under given circumstances his consent can legitimately be presumed. The owner must be reasonable, however, in his unwillingness, that is, he may not act contrary to any obligation either from justice or charity to allow the alienation of his property, e.g., in extreme necessity of another. The sin of theft is of itself grievous, being the violation of justice and of charity. However, its guilt may be venial, if the value of the object stolen is inconsiderable in itself, and in respect to the condition in life of the owner. —C.E.; Slater, Manual of Moral Theology, N. Y., 1908.

Theism (Gr., theos, God), a philosophical system affirming the existence of God, as against atheism, but not always admitting a personal God, and commonly also rejecting belief in the Christian view of God, in the Trinity for instance, in the moral responsibilities of man, in the Incarnation, etc.—Sheen, God and Intelligence, N. Y., 1925. (j. j. mcg.)

Theobald (Theobald), Abp. of Canterbury, d. 1161. He entered the Benedictine Monastery of Bec, and was elected archbishop, 1138. He introduced civil law into England and founded a law school at Canterbury. He figured prominently in the quarrel between the Church and the English king and consequently suffered temporary banishment; later, refusing to crown Eustace, the king’s son, he was forced to flee. While in Normandy he reconciled Henry of Anjou with Stephen, and crowned Henry II.—C.E.

Theocracy (Gr., theos; kratos, power), a form of government in which God is considered ruler, acting usually through a priesthood, and by which every civic and social act becomes religious. This form prevailed to a great extent among the Jews after the first return from exile. It is the mode of government Calvin sought to introduce in Geneva, 1552.—C.E.

Theodicy (Gr., theos; diké, justice; justified), a scientific treatise which concerns itself with God’s existence and attributes as known by reason alone. It develops the arguments which prove the existence of a personal, intelligent God and evolves the findings of human reason about God’s nature and attributes. It is also called natural theology.—C.E.; Boedder, Natural Theology, N. Y., 1906. (L. A. A.)

Theodore (c. 602-690), Abp. of Canterbury, b. Tarsus in Cilicia; d. Canterbury, England. By uniting the heterogeneous churches of the several English kingdoms, he achieved ecclesiastical unity in England. He filled the vacant bishoprics, instituted the teaching of music and of sacred and secular learning, and in 673 convoked the first English synod at Horton.—C.E.

Theodore I, Pope (642-649). A Greek of Jerusalem, he died at Rome. His firm opposition to Monothelitism led him to condemn the Heraclean Ecthesis, to demand a recall of the Typus of Constantinople II, and to excommunicate the Patriarchs Paul and Pyrrhus. During his pontificate occurred the first recorded instance of the translation of the bodies of the saints, those of Sts. Primus and Felicianus, from the catacombs to a basilica on the Caelian Hill.—C.E.; Mann.

Theodore II, Pope (897), d. Rome. During his pontificate he reinstated the clerics whom Stephen (VI) VII had deposed, and caused the body of Pope Formosus to be reinterred in St. Peter’s. He died, renowned for his love of the poor.—C.E. Mann.

Theodore of Amasea, surnamed Tyro (Timbo), Saint, martyr (306), b. Syria, or Armenia; d. Amasea. From the panegyric delivered by St. Gregory of Nyssa on Theodore’s feast, we know that he was a recruit in the Roman army and for a time belonged to the Cohors Tyronum, whose captain, in German, name Tyro. He was in winter quarters at Pontus at the outbreak of the persecution, 303; brought to trial for his faith, the judges, pretending compassion for his youth, dismissed him, giving him opportunity to recant. He then set fire to the Temple of Cybele at Amasea. After his third examination he was condemned to death, was torn with whips, placed on a rack, and burned alive. Patron against storms. Buried at Brindisi, Italy; head at Gaeta. His cult originated at Euchais, where his shrine was held in great veneration. He is the titular saint of an ancient church in Venice, built by Narses; a collegiate church at Rome, and numerous churches in the East bear his name. Feast, R. Cal., 9 Nov.—C.E.; Mann.

Theodoric, antipope (1100-02), known to the schismatics as Bp. of Rufina. He was elected in opposition to Paschal II by the followers of Henry IV of Germany and the deceased antipope Guibert of Ravenna. Unable to maintain his claim, he was about to flee to Henry when he was seized and brought before Paschal, who consigned him to the monastery of Joux-Cava, where he died.—Mann.

Theodosius I (Flavius Theodosius), c. 346-395, Roman emperor, b. Spain; d. Milan. In 379 the Emperor Gratian called him from private life in Spain and made him his fellow emperor (Augustus), to rule over the East. He triumphed over the Goths, suppressed the Vandals and the Huns, expelled the Arians from Constantinople, and completely stamped out paganism. In compliance with the direction of Ambrose, Bp. of Milan, he did penance for his massacre of 7000 citizens at Thessalonica, before entering the cathedral there.—C.E.

Theodosius II (401-450), Emperor of the East, son of Arcadius; came to the throne, 408. He fought two wars with Persia, 421 and 441, successfully repelled the invading Huns, ended the piracies of Genseric, and labored to stamp out paganism. He is notable for the Theodosian Code, and the Council of Ephesus which was summoned, 431, under his protection.

Theological Virtues (Gr., theos; logos, science), the virtues which were the God-directed for their object; Faith, or belief in God; Hope; Charity, or Love of God. The symbol of faith is the cross; of hope, the anchor; and of charity, the heart. (Ed.)

Theology (Gr., theos; logos, science), the science of God, that is, the knowledge which we have or can have of God and Divine things. We distinguish between natural theology (also called Revealed theology), which is acquired by the light of reason alone, and supernatural theology, which is the “science of faith.” Though both sciences also include creatures in their discussion, yet their principal object is God, as God. For the main purpose of theology is to understand the Godhead, as far as this is possible in the present life; creatures and God’s relation to them are not excluded, but they are secondary. Natural theology proves the existence of God and His various attributes; from them are deduced the various relations existing between God and creatures, especially between God and man. The Vatican Council anathematizes those who deny that human reason, without the aid of faith, can know for certain, God, Our Creator and Lord. The science, or Love of God. The symbol of faith is the cross; of hope, the anchor; and of charity, the heart. (Ed.)

of the Godhead; the Vatican Council itself assures us of it. Scholastic theology is nothing else than a happy combination of positive and speculative theology. It not only establishes what truths have been revealed, but, calling to its aid the principles of philosophy, it seeks to advance to a more perfect grasp of the same truths. Beyond this, Scholastics have always considered it as their special duty to defend the truths of faith against all adversaries: Jews and pagans, heretics and modern rationalists. Hence the unmeasured abuse heaped upon them by all enemies of the Catholic Church; hence, too, the lavish praise given them by the popes, who recognize in them the watchdogs of the household of faith.

The history of theology runs through three fairly well-marked periods. The first may be called the patristic age. From the first century of the Christian era, the efforts of the Fathers of the Church were directed towards explaining the truths of Revelation to the common people, and towards defending them against Jews, pagans, and heretics. There existed then no system of theology; particular truths were explained and defended as occasion offered or necessity demanded. Thus Saint Irenæus (d. 202) and Clement of Alexandria (d. 217) wrote against the Gnostics, who claimed to possess a higher revelation than that preached to the ordinary Christians. Saint Athanasius (d. 373) spent his life in defending the Divinity of Christ against Arians. St. Hilary of Poitiers (d. 366), St. Basil (d. 379), and the two Gregorys sought to penetrate deeper into the mystery of the Blessed Trinity. Fighting against the heresy of Nestorius, St. Cyril of Alexandria (d. 444) pronounced his famous 12 anathemas: which were later accepted as expressing the mind of the Church. By the Councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon, even St. Augustine (d. 430), an intellectual giant among the Fathers, did not develop a system, but explained and defended many particulars, especially the relation between man's freedom and grace. With St. John Damascene (d. 754), the last of the Fathers, begins a period of transition. He drew up a careful summary of what the Fathers had written on the various dogmas of faith, thereby rendering a twofold service to theology: he laid the positive foundation on which the Scholastics of a later date could rear their marvelous synthesis; and he taught the tumultuous centuries intervening between him and them to preserve the rich treasures contained in the writings of the Fathers.

The second period, that of the Scholastics, was ushered in by St. Anselm of Canterbury (d. 1109). Choosing for his motto the dictum "fides quaevis intellectum" (faith desires of being understood), he discussed the principal and most difficult dogmas of faith, so that the human mind might, to some slight extent, understand them and thus be enabled to reduce them to a system. The road was now open for the Scholastics. Peter the Lombard (d. 1164), though entitling his great work "Sentences," that is, teachings of Scripture and the Fathers, yet emphasized speculative understanding of the truths of faith. He was followed by Alexander of Hales (d. 1245), St. Bonaventure (d. 1274), and other Doctors of the Franciscan school. But medieval Scholasticism reached its perfection in Albert the Great (d. 1280) and in his pupil, St. Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274), the king of Scholastics. It was not fulsome praise when Pope John XXII said of St. Thomas that he enlightened the Church more than all the other Doctors, and that a year devoted to the study of his works was worth more than a whole life spent under other teachers. St. Thomas was not only thoroughly at home in the sacred writings and in the works of the Fathers; he also possessed an exceptionally brilliant mind, so that he could fathom the most profound problems, find the right answer, and present both problem and answer in language of unsurpassed clearness.

After him arose the various schools of medieval theology: Thomists, Scotists, Augustinians, Carmelites, each of them boasting some great men who carried on the Scholastic tradition. But there was an evident decline. As the centuries rolled by, a sterile preoccupation with mere subtleties became the vogue. Gabriel Biel (d. 1485), who belonged to the school of the Nominalists, is generally called the last of the Scholastics.

The Protestant Reformation was the occasion for a new awakening and for the beginning of the third period of theology. There was no more time for clever subtleties; fundamental principles were at stake. Luther had denied the authority of the Church and tradition, and the theologians of the 16th century took up the gauntlet. Melchior Cano (d. 1560) wrote his "De locis theologicis," the pioneer work of what is today called fundamental theology. The newly-founded Society of Jesus reared a powerful phalanx to do battle against the new enemies of the Catholic faith: St. Peter Canisius, Lessius, Cornelius a Lapide, above all, the controversiast Robert Bellarmine, and Suarez, perhaps the greatest theologian of modern times. About the middle of the 17th century the efforts of the counter-Reformation began to slacken, and little originality is apparent in the works of the successors of these great men. By the end of the 18th century, owing to the suppression of the Society of Jesus and the ruthless spirit of the French Revolution, Scholastic theology was brought to the verge of extinction. Still, the 19th century witnessed a marvelous revival. While rationalism began to infect more and more the universities of Europe, God also raised an army of His own to meet the new danger. Men like Kleutgen, Palmieri, Franzelin, and a host of other theologians not only sought to re-establish the principles and method of Scholasticism in the modern curriculum, but also applied them to the solution of modern problems. Their intention was officially sanctioned in the encyclical "Eternali Patris," and the new Code of Canon Law obliges the professors of seminaries to follow in their lectures the method, teaching, and principles of the Angelic Doctor (can. 1366, 2). For definitions of the various branches of theology, see Dogmatic Theology; Moral Theology; Ascetical Theology; Mystical Theology; Pastoral Theology.

Theosophical Societies, founded in New York City, in 1875, by Madame Blavatsky. In 1908 Mrs. Annie Besant and M. C. W. Leadbeater, and others who continued her work, baptized a young Hindu, Krishnamurti, gave him the name of Alekone, and represented him as the Messias. R. Stein of Germany protested against this kind of Messianism, was excommunicated along with 2400 German members, and founded his own sect of “Anthroposophists.” Since 1913 there have been two groups of theosophists. The fundamental doctrine of theosophy is the brotherhood of man and the tolerance of all religious beliefs, Atheism, Buddhism, and Christianity. Pantheistic in outlook, it denies a personal God and personal immortality. A decree of the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office, 16 July, 1919, confirmed by Benedict XV, stated that theosophy could not be reconciled with the Catholic Faith, and forbade Catholics to assist at their meetings or read their publications.—C.E.; Martindale, Theosophy, Lond., 1914. Theosophy, or theosis, God; tikto, bring forth), title of Our Lady proclaimed at the Council of Ephesus.

There is an everlasting home, hymn by Matthew Bridges.

Thessalonians, Epistles to the. Paul wrote two letters to the Thessalonians, both from Corinth and both A.D. 51. After reminding them of his work among them and of his affection for them, he urges them to preserve purity and charity, in expectation of the resurrection which will happen when least expected, and therefore, a motive for being prepared and fortified with the virtues he asked them to cultivate. In the second epistle he again exhorts them to be steadfast against teachers who hold false views of the resurrection and the time of its occurrence, reminds them of his example, and bids them quit the company of those who “walk disorderly, working not at all, but curiously meddling.” Passages from the epistle occur in the Divine Office in the Fourth Week after Epiphany. The Biblical Commission, June, 1915, decided that it is not allowed to explain passages of the epistle by saying that the Apostles might use possibly erroneous expressions of their own; that Paul said nothing in disaccord with the ignorance about the time of the Second Coming which Christ Himself had proclaimed; that his words should not be taken to imply a Coming so near at hand that the Apostle expected himself and his hearers to be of the number of the faithful who would survive to meet Christ.—C.E. Thief in the Night, parable in Luke, 12. It follows the parable of the “wise and foolish virgins” (q.v.). In Matt., 24, it belongs to the great eschatological discourse on Mount Olivet, Tuesday of Holy Week. In both cases it is addressed to the Apostles. Nothing prohibited Christ from using the same short simile twice, the less so where He wanted to emphasize the same point, which is explicitly stated in Matthew: “Watch ye therefore, because you know not what hour your Lord will come.” Hence the meaning is: Be ever ready, as a good man who has obtained information that thieves are planning to rob his house. The application to Christian life is simple: the hour of death being uncertain, one must be...

Thiers, Louis Adolphe (1797-1877), statesman and historian, b. Marseilles; d. Paris. He aided the downfall of the Bourbons, supported King Louis Philippe, and secured the suppression of the Jesuits in France. Deputy of the opposition, he vainly sought aid for France during the Franco-Prussian War; and as first president of the Third Republic, he negotiated the Treaty of Frankfort. His inconsistent policy is shown by his support of anti-religious liberalism under the Restoration and the monarchy, of Catholic claims under the Second Republic, and of the anti-clerical parties of the Third Republic. He was the author of histories of the French Revolution and of the Consulate and Empire.—CE.

Third Orders, in general, associations of the laity sponsored by religious orders, dating from the 13th century. The members, called tertaries, do not of necessity live in community, but they may wear the habit and share in the good works of the parent order. Permission of the Holy See to establish third orders has been granted to the Augustinians, Carmelites, Dominicans, Friars Minor, Minims, Premonstratensians, Servites, and Trinitarians. Third orders may be secular or regular. The former are associations of "persons living in the world who strive after Christian perfection in a manner conformable with their station in life under the direction and according to the spirit of a religious order, abiding by the rules approved for the association by the Apostolic See" (Can. 702). Third orders regular are made up of religious living a community life under vows. They owe their origin, for the most part, to groups of members of the third order secular who left the world and lived a common life in order to devote themselves to works of charity and instruction. Eventually they were allowed to take vows and thus became religious.

Third Order of Our Lady of Mount Carmel was canonically instituted by a papal Bull of 1452, obtained by Bl. John Soreth, General of the Carmelites, when a group of Beguines at Guelders sought to be affiliated with the order. At first following a modified form of the Carmelite Rule, the tertiaries now observe that of Theodor Stratius, General of the Calced Carmelites, drawn up, 1635, and revised, 1678. There are communities of brothers, priests, and nuns in England, Ireland, and several other European countries, India, Syria, and South America. The Third Order Secular of the Order of Our Lady of Mount Carmel is also found in the United States.

Third Order of St. Dominic, a development from St. Francis's Ordo de Penitentia. A body of the laity vowed to piety, the Brothers and Sisters of the Penance of St. Dominic, attached itself to the Order of Preachers and was given a rule, 1265, by Muñon de Zamora, seventh master-general of the whole order. The foundation was confirmed by Honorius IV, 1286. The Militia Jesu Christi, a military order founded for the defense of the Church against the Albigenses, under the spiritual administration of the Friars Preachers, was amalgamated with it towards the close of the 13th century. St. Catherine of Siena, one of its members, is patron of the Third Order. A number of regular congregations of tertiaries have been established in England, Ireland, and the United States, members engaging in charitable and educational works; Dominican secular tertiaries are numerous. The Third Teaching Order of St. Dominic, founded in France for men, 1852, by Fr. Lacordaire, has several colleges in other countries, and is considered a special province of the Dominicans. Congregations of regular tertiaries in the United States are:

Congregation of Dominican Tertiaries of the Blessed Virgin, founded, 1830, by the Sisters of St. Dominic of Springfield, Ky. The congregation conducts 30 houses, including colleges, academies, and parochial schools, with mother-house at East Columbus, O. Religious total 432.

Congregation of Saint Catherine di Ricci, founded at Glen Falls, N. Y., 1880, by Sister Maria Catherine di Ricci, for the work of retreats. The sisters have 9 houses, including homes, academies, and a parochial school, with mother-house in Albany, N. Y. Religious total 84.

Congregation of Saint Catherine of Siena (Fall River, Mass.), a congregation of Dominican sisters, founded, 1891, by sisters from Carrollton, Mo. They have 3 houses, and teach in 7 schools. Religious total 104.

Congregation of Saint Dominie (Blauvelt, N. Y.), founded by Dominican sisters from the Holy Rosary Convent, New York, has 24 houses, including schools, high schools, a hospital, orphanage, school for blind children, and a home for adult blind, with mother-house at Blauvelt. Religious total 280.

Congregation of the Sisters of Saint Dominic (Caldwell, N. Third Order of Saint Francis, a branch of the Franciscan Order. The Third Order Secular was founded, probably at Florence, for men and women living in the world. A rule was drawn up in accord with Franciscan ideals by St. Francis, aided by Card. Ugolinus, later Gregory IX. During the pontificate of Nicholas IV direction of the Third Order was confided to the Friars Minor. In 1883 Leo XIII modified the text of the rule as given by Nicholas IV in 1289 and later mitigated, and placed the Third Order under the Friars Minor, Conventuals, Capuchins, and the Regular Third Order. Tertiaries number over 2,000,000 throughout the world.

The Third Order Regular of St. Francis dates from the second half of the 13th century. It arose in different forms in the Netherlands, Southern France, Germany, and Italy, and is now represented in a great many countries. In order to secure uniformity of the numerous congregations, which differed widely in their organization, Leo X gave a new form to their rule, 1521, and subjected them all to the First Order of Saint Francis, a stipulation rejected by some of the congregations. A new rule for regular tertiaries of both sexes was substituted by Pius XI, 1927. Many new congregations arose in the 19th century, most of them engaging in hospital, educational, or missionary labors. They follow the Rule of the Third Order Regular, modified by their own constitutions.

Thirty-Nine Articles, the doctrinal declarations formulated and promulgated by the Estab-
Thirty-Nine Articles. — The, a politico-religious conflict which, purely German at first, soon became almost European and lasted from 1618 to 1648. It began in Bohemia, where the inhabitants of Prague, enraged by the suppression of two Protestant temples, threw the emperor’s officials through the windows of the city hall. It is divided into four periods: (1) THE PALATINE PERIOD (1618-24), during which the insurgents were crushed at the battle of the White Mountain (1620). The Catholics’ reprisals inspired the Czechs with a hatred lasting to this day. (2) THE DANISH PERIOD (1625-29), thus called from the intervention, on the Protestant side, of Christian IV of Denmark; it ended in another Catholic triumph, the Peace of Lübeck, following two victories by Wallenstein over Christian at Dessau and Lutter. (3) THE SWEDISH PERIOD (1630-35), thus called from the prominent part played by Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden against the Catholics of Germany, with the help, strange to say, of Cardinal Richelieu. After a first victory on the Lech (1632), Gustavus Adolphus was killed at Lützen and the Swedes crushed at Nordlingen (1634); the period ended with the Peace of Prague (1635) which made Ferdinand II once more master of all Germany. (4) THE FRENCH PERIOD (1635-48), during which Richelieu tried to profit by the weakening of Germany to carry out his favorite policy, the humbling of the House of Austria. Four French armies invaded Germany, where they remained 13 years. The principal events were the victories of Condé at Rocroy (1643) and Lens (1648), and that of Turenne at Sommershausen (1647). The war ended with the famous Treaty of Westphalia (1648-49) which marked the irretrievable defeat of Austria, and was so unfavorable to the Church that Pope Innocent X entered a vigorous protest against it. — C.E.; Butler.

Blessed Thomas Abel (AEBEL or ABLE), (1497-1540), d. Smithfield, England. He was a graduate of Oxford, and chaplain to Queen Catherine of Aragon. He was put to death for defending the validity of her marriage to Henry VIII, and disseminating the prophecies of the Holy Maid of Kent. Beatified, 1886. — C.E.

Blessed Thomas a Kempis (DE AULT; (1480-1531), writer on mystical theology, b. Baeza, Andalusia; d. Rome. He joined the Discalced Carmelites at Valladolid, 1586, and filled the posts of reader of Divinity at Seville, prior at Saragossa, and provost of the Institute, 1851, and professor of composition, N. Y., 1919. (P. P. D.)

Blessed Thomas Aquinas, SAINT, Confessor, Doctor of the Church (1225-74), b. Rocca Secca, Naples, Italy; d. Fossa Nuova. His family was related to the Emperors Frederic II and Henry VI, and to the division of the Apostles. At his refusal to go, Jesus, appearing in His supernatural way, sold him to Abba, the envoy of Gundafadar, Thomas converted Gundafadar, and also the wife of the Syriac king and his son. Afterwards he was put to death and buried with the ancient kings. Some belief is attached to this legend, for the existence of Gundaphernes (Gundafadar) in 46 has been proved; a granite cross in Mylapore marks the place of the martyrdom of Thomas, and the Thomas Christians trace their origin to him. Relics at Edessa. Patron of architects, and the Indies. Emblems: a lance, and a cross, and a censer. Feast, R. Cal., 21 Dec.— C.E.; Butler.
the kings of Aragon, Castile, and France; he studied under the Benedictine monks at Monte Cassino, and entered the University of Naples in 1236. He joined the Dominican Order, 1243, against the will of his family, who held him a prisoner in a fortress at Rocca Secca for almost two years; commanded by the pope and emperor, they were forced to liberate him; he immediately pronounced his religious vows. He was sent to Cologne and Paris, and studied under Albertus Magnus; taught in Paris, 1252-60; and lived at the court of Pope Urban IV, 1261-64. He was placed in charge of the Dominican school at Rome and later at Viterbo. In 1293, he was sent to London as the representative of the Roman province at a general chapter of the order. From 1265-72 he was occupied in writing the “Summa,” the masterpiece of his philosophical and theological writings, and the basis of Scholastic philosophy. A revised edition of the English translation by the Dominicans was published in London, 1921. He died on the way to the Council of Lyons, and “on his deathbed, discussed the Canticle of Canticles.” Patron of Catholic students, schools, and universities. Emblems: ox, chalice, dove, monstrance, and a person trampled underfoot. Relics in St. Sernin, Toulouse. Feast, R. Cal., 7 March.—C.E.; Butler; Conway, St.

THOMAS AQUINAS

Becket was murdered in the cathedral at Canterbury by four retainers of Henry. He was canonized less than three years afterwards, and his shrine was a center of pilgrimages until the time of Henry VIII. Feast, R. Cal., 29 Dec.—C.E.; Ward (The Canterbury Pilgrimages, Lond., 1904

Thomas Cottam, Blessed, martyr (1549-82), b. Lancashire, England; d. Tyburn. He was a graduate of Oxford, 1572. Converted to the faith, he was ordained at Soissons, 1580, and set out for the English mission. Arrested at Dover, he was imprisoned in the Marshalsea, and later in the Tower, and after repeated examinations under torture, was hanged. Beatified, 1888.—C.E.

Thomas Ford, Blessed, martyr (1582), b. Devonshire, England; d. Tyburn. He was educated at Trinity College, Oxford, and at Douai, where he was ordained, 1573, and sent on the English mission. Arrested with Bl. Edmund Campion, he was accused of complicity in the Reims and Rome plot, and hanged. Beatified, 1888.—C.E.

Thomas Green, Blessed, martyr (1537), d. Tyburn, England. He was a priest of the London Charterhouse. Refusing the Oath of Supremacy, he was imprisoned at Newgate, where he died of starvation. Beatified, 1888.

Thomas Johnson, Blessed, martyr (1537), d. Newgate prison, London. He was a priest in the London Charterhouse. Arrested with Richard Bere and others, for refusing to take the Oath of Supremacy, he was imprisoned at Newgate, where he died of starvation. Beatified, 1888.—C.E.

Thomas More, Blessed, martyr (1477-1535), b. London; d. Tower Hill. He was brought up under the tutelage of Cardinal Morton, Abp. of Canterbury, spent two years at Oxford and acquired a foundation in the classics. After leaving the university he became prominent in the legal profession, and distinguished himself in Parliament, attracting the attention of King Henry VIII. In 1529 he was made Lord Chancellor of England. When he found the king’s opinion on marriage and the supremacy of the Roman pontiff incompatible with his own, he resigned the chancellorship, 1532. He lived in retirement, and engaged in literary pursuits and the defense of religion. Refusing to acknowledge the ecclesiastical supremacy, he was imprisoned at Newgate, where he died of starvation. Beatified, 1888.—C.E.
which Henry claimed to have received from Parliament, he was arrested on the charge of treason, imprisoned, and beheaded. He left a large collection of writings, best known of which is “Utopia.” His life, exemplary for its piety and prayerfulness, was crowned by the courage and calm with which he submitted to his martyrdom. Beatified, 1888. Feasts, 9 July.—C.E.; Stapleton, tr. Hallett, Life of Sir Thomas More, Lond., 1928; Last Letters of Blessed Thomas More, ed. Campbell, Lond., 1924; Pope, More v. Thomas of Dover (d. 1295), martyred for refusing to disclose the treasures of the Benedictine priory of St. Martin to the French, who were ravaging Dover with fire and sword.—C.E.

Thomas of Eccleston, 13th-century Friar Minor and chronicler. He was a student at Oxford (1230-40), and later stationed at the convent of his order in London. He is famous for his chronicle of what has been called the heroic period of the Franciscan Friars in England, 1224-58. It is a collection of notes, without any dates or chronological order, but accurate, reliable, and valuable as an account of early Franciscan events and ideals. There is an English translation by Fr. Guthbert, O.S.F.C., “The Friars and how they came to England.”—C.E., V, 269.

Thomas of Hereford (Thomas de Cantilupe), Saint, confessor (1218-82), Bp. of Hereford, b. Hambledon, England; d. Orvieto, Italy. In 1265 he was appointed Lord Chancellor of England, and was consecrated Bp. of Hereford, 1275. He led the bishops in their resistance to the policy of Abp. Peckham, who exiled and excommunicated him. He died while Journeying to Rome to plead his cause before the pope. Canonized, 1320. Relics at Hereford. Feast, England, 3 Oct.—C.E.; Butler.

Thomas of Villanova, Saint (1488-1555), Abp. of Valencia, b. Fuentellana, Spain; d. Valencia. Educated at the University of Alcalá, he occupied the chair of arts, logic, and philosophy, 1514; joined the Augustinians, and was ordained priest, 1520; held various important positions in his Order; and in 1544 was made Abp. of Valencia. He became renowned for charity, and was known by such titles as “Almsgiver” and “Father of the Poor”; he promoted education by establishing schools and colleges, rebuilt the hospital of the city, and inaugurated every manner of charitable works while living in the greatest poverty. The best edition of his works, which consist mainly of mystical sermons, is that of Manila, 1882-84. Patron of Valencia. Canonized, 1858. Buried in Augustinian church, Valencia. Feast, 21 Sept.—C.E.; Butler.

Thomas Percy, Blessed, martyr (1528-72), Earl of Northumberland, d. York. In reward for his successful capture of Scarborough Castle, he was given the lands and titles lost by his father. However, he led an uprising of the Catholic gentry against Elizabeth, was captured in Scotland, and beheaded. Beatified, 1895.—C.E.

Thomas Plumtree (Plumptre), Blessed, martyr (1570), d. Durham, England. He was ordained during the reign of Queen Mary, and served as chaplain in France, and then of the Earl of Northumberland and Westmorland. Beatified, 1888.

Thomas Scrivven, Blessed, martyr (1537), d. Newgate prison, London. He was a Carthusian lay-brother of the London Charterhouse. Refusing to take the Oath of Supremacy, he was imprisoned with Thomas Johnson at Newgate, where he died of starvation. Beatified, 1888.

Thomas Sherwood, Blessed, martyr (1551-78), b. London; d. Tyburn. He was on his way to Douai College to study for the priesthood at the time of his arrest, 1576. He was hanged and quartered for denying the royal supremacy. Beatified, 1888.—C.E.

Thomas Woodhouse, Blessed, martyr (1572), d. Tyburn, England. He was a secular priest in Lincolnshire. Arrested while saying Mass, 1561, he was kept in custody in Fleet prison, London, until 1572, when he wrote a letter to Lord Burleigh, urging him to seek reconciliation with the pope. Steadfast in his refusal to turn Protestant, he was finally hanged and quartered. Beatified, 1888.—C.E.

Thomism, named after Thomas Aquinas, to signify his teachings in philosophy and theology, and also the teachings of theologians since his time more or less in accordance with his system. The chief characteristic and merit of St. Thomas was his comprehensive synthesis of human knowledge, especially in philosophy and theology, his glowing from the science of the past, from Aristotle onward, his coordination of the sciences of his day, and judicious discrimination between what was scientifically established and what was only theoretical or speculative; the Trinity, the Divine attributes, the angels, heaven, grace, Incarnation, Sacraments; all these were treated by Thomas in such a masterly manner that since his day no philosopher or theologian can discuss them without due regard to his opinions. Thomism also means the Thomistic school of philosophers and theologians who follow Thomas in the main but occasionally differ with one another and with the master, or rather develop his teaching and modernize it by the application of his principles. to the solution of present-day problems. Since the past half century, owing principally to the zeal of Leo XIII for Thomistic studies, has witnessed a remarkable renewal of interest in Thomism, the teachings during that period go by the name of Neo-Thomism.—C.E.; Grabmann, tr. Michel, Thomas Aquinas, His Personality and Thought, N. Y., 1928.

Thompson, Francis (1859-1901), English poet, b. Preston, Lancashire; d. London. Unknown and alone in London, he was discovered and befriended by Wilfrid Meynell, editor of "Merry England," to whom Francis had sent some of his early poetry. Among his poems, written from 1889 to 1896, the most famous are "The Hound of Heaven," "Ode to the Setting Sun," and "Daisy"; of his prose works, "Shelley," "Life of St. Ignatius," and "Health and Holiness."—C.E.; Mégroz, Francis Thompson, The Poet of Earth in Heaven, Lond., 1927; Meynell, Life of Francis Thompson, N. Y., 1929.

Thorns, Holy, two of the sacred thorns which pierced Our Lord's head, preserved in the Basilica of Santa Croce in Gerusalemme, at Rome. These were condemned; the third with the final healing pierced Our Lord's head, preserved in the Basilica of St. Peter, Rome. Lauding the thorns, Holier, two of the sacred thorns which were enshrined there. Under Robert Blyth, the last abbot, the abbey was confi­scated by Henry VIII, Earl of Bedford, whose family still owns them.—C.E.

Thoron Abbey, Cambridge, England, for three centuries the seat of Saxon hermits or anchorites, before it was refounded, 972, for Benedictine monks by Ethelwold, Bp. of Winchester, and King Edgar. The bodies of St. Botulph and other Saxon saints were translated there. Under Robert Brythe, in 1216, the abbey was confiscated by Henry VIII, 1539. The buildings became the property of John, Earl of Bedford, whose family still owns them.—C.E.

Three Hours, a devotion to honor the Passion of Our Lord, held from noon to three o'clock on Good Friday. Prayers and hymns alternate with a series of short sermons, usually on the Seven Last Words from the Cross. The devotion was started in St. Francis Xavier's Church, New York, in 1885, and is now customary in many churches, Protestant as well as Catholic.

Three Taverns, station on the Appian Way, about 33 m. from Rome and 10 m. from Appii Forum. It was a general meeting-place for travelers; the Christian brethren came from Rome in two parties to meet St. Paul on his journey to that city, one greeting him at Appii Forum, the other at Three Taverns (Acts, 28).

The throne, in liturgy, the permanent chair or seat of the diocesan bishop in the cathedral church, which is used by him when he presides at solemn functions. Made of wood or stone, it is placed on the Gospel side near the altar; the chair has a high back, rests on a platform having three steps, and is covered with a square canopy. The use of a throne is permitted to a diocesan bishop throughout his diocese, to a metropolitan in his province, to a cardinal everywhere outside Rome and in his titular church at Rome, to the papal throne is the portable Sedes Gestatoria (q.v.).—C.E.

Thrones, those angels who compose the lowest choir of the highest order of angels (see ANGEL). With the Seraphim and Cherubim, they form the court of God, the Heavenly King, in Whose presence they stand forever, adoring Him and praising Him; hence they are not occupied directly with the world and are rarely sent as messengers to man.—O'Connell, The Holy Angels, N. Y., 1923. (A. J. H.)

Thundering Legion, THE (Lat., legio fulminata). When Marcus Aurelius fought the Quadi (174), his army, exhausted by thirst, nearly fell a prey to the enemy. The 12th Legion, entirely Christian, prayed for help; a thunderstorm arose, which brought relief to the Romans and dispersed the enemy. The emperor then issued a decree forbidding the persecution of the Christians, and gave the Legion the name fulminata. Tertullian refers to this occurrence, and Apollinaris of Hierapolis is an authority for the alleged miracle, but modern writers, while admitting the thunderstorm, call the decree a forgery. It is a fact that the persecution of the Christians became even more cruel after this incident.—C.E.

Thurible (Lat., thuribulum; from thus, incense), a censer, or vessel, hung on chains and used for the burning of incense at church services. See Censer.

Thursday (Scandinavian god, Thor), day of the week consecrated by the Church for devotion to the Holy Eucharist.

Thyatira, a city of Lydia in Asia Minor, one of the seven churches in Asia, to whose bishop St. John addressed an epistle (Apoc., 2).—C.E.

Tiará, papal crown, a tall head-dress of gold cloth ornamented with precious stones, encircled with three coronets, and surmounted by a cross. The original tiara consisted of a plain, helmet-like cap, of white material, and was provided with its first circlet about 1130 (J. F. S.), the second being added during the pontificate of Boniface VIII (1294-1303), while the earliest representation of the tiara with three crowns is found on the effigy of Benedict XII (d. 1342). The first circlet symbolizes the pope's universal episcopate, the second his supremacy of jurisdiction, and the third his temporal influence. It is placed on his head at his coronation by the second cardinal deacon, with the words: "Receive the tiara adorned with three crowns and know that thou art Father of princes and kings, Ruler of the World. Vicar of our Saviour Jesus Christ." Its earliest name, kamelaukion (made of camel's hair); would indicate that it was of Byzantine origin and was probably adopted by the popes in the 7th or 8th century from the Byzantine court head-dress, the kamelaukion. It is worn only at non-liturgical ceremonies.—C.E.

Tiberius, Sea of. See Galilee, Sea of.

Tiberius, second Roman emperor, a.d. 14-37, d. Capri. He was the son of Tiberius Claudius Nero and Livia, and stepson of the Emperor Augustus who adopted him and with whom he was appointed co-regent (a.d. 10). Described by historians as a cruel tyrant, of recent years the opinion has been that he was a wise and just ruler, who reformed and improved every department of the government, and promoted the prosperity of the Roman Empire.

The ministry and death of Our Lord, and of John the Baptist, occurred during the reign of Tiberius, who spent his last years in seclusion on the island of Capri.—C.E.

Tiburtius and Susanna, Saints, martyrs (286 and 295). d. Rome. Tiburtius was the son of Chromatius, prefect of Rome, who after condemning many Christians to death, was converted to Christianity and baptized by St. Polycarp. During the persecution of Diocletian Tiburtius declared his faith and was made to walk over red-hot coals, but by a miracle remained uninjured; the miracle being ascribed to magic, he was beheaded on the Via Labicana at a spot called "the two laurel trees." Susanna was a Roman virgin, niece to Pope Caius, beheaded in her father's house by the command of Diocletian; the house which was near the two laurel trees was turned into a church named in her honor, and there her relics are venerated. Relics of St. Tiburtius in St. Peter's in the Vatican. Feast, R. Cal., 11 Aug.—C.E.; Butler.

Tiburtius, Valerian, and Maximus, Saints, martyrs, d. 229. They were converted to Christianity by St. Cecilia, to whom Valerian was espoused; Tiburtius was the brother of Valerian; and Maximus, their jailer, was converted by their example. Buried first in the cemetery of Praetextatus, Paochal I moved their relics to the church of St. Cecilia. Relics in S. Paolino, Lucca. Feast, R. Cal., 14 Apr.—Butler.

Tieffentaller, Joseph (1710-85), Jesuit missionary and noted geographer, b. Bozen, in the Tyrol; d. Lucknow, India. He went to the East Indian mission in 1740, and after the suppression of the Jesuits remained in India, writing and making scientific observations. Among his works are "Descriptio Indiae," comprising an atlas of the basin of the Ganges, observations of the fauna and flora of India, astronomical and astrological studies of the country, a contemporary history and articles on the various religions of India, and a Sanscrit-Parsee lexicon.—C.E.

Tierney, Mark Aloysius (1795-1862), priest and antiquary, b. Brighton, England; d. Arundel. While chaplain to the Duke of Norfolk, at Arundel Castle, he devoted himself to historical and antiquarian studies. In 1833 he was elected a Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries, in 1841 a Fellow of the Royal Society, serving also as Secretary of the Sussex Archaeological Society. After the restoration of the hierarchy he was the first canon penitentiary of Southwark. He brought out five volumes of a new edition of Doid's "Church History of England" with annotations, and documents which he had discovered. He wrote "History of the Antiquities of the Castle of Arundel," and succeeded Quin for a time as editor of the "Dublin Review."—C.E.

Tigris, Saint, sister of St. Patrick and the mother of five bishops.—C.E.

Tillemont, Louis Sébastien Le Nain de (1637-98), French historian and priest, b. Paris; d. there. Devoted to historical research, he supplied others with much material, collected notes on St. Louis for Lemaistre de la Cé, which were printed after De la Cé's death, and wrote "Histoire des emperors"
TILLEMONT

Time is a notion which arises from our experience of the changes occurring among extended bodies, which constitute a continuous succession of events. Time is conceived as an ideal medium in which objective changes and subjective states of consciousness are distinguished as prior and subsequent. Consequently it can be measured and expressed by a number of units of duration, which may be seconds or centuries. Time is an abstraction, hence subjective, but it originates from the objective world. Einstein advanced the famous hypothesis of a curved four-dimensional space, or continuum, in which time is but the fourth dimension. —C.E.; McWilliams, Cosmology, N. Y., 1928.

Timotheus and Symphorian, Saints, martyrs (311 and 178). St. Timotheus, a holy man, came from Antioch to Rome; preached Christianity there; was put to death by Maxentius. St. Symphorian was at first a Christian of Antioch in Cilicia; was seized by the pagan mob for refusing to adore the statue of Cybele as it was carried through the streets; was beaten with clubs, cast into prison, and put to death by the sword. Feast, R. Cal., 21 Aug.—C.E.; Butler.

Timothy, Epistles to. St. Paul wrote to Timothy, as Bishop of Ephesus, two letters, pastoral, as they are called, because they contain instruction and advice about the sacred ministry. Paul converted Timothy on his second journey, and thereafter they were practically inseparable. In the first letter Paul warns him against certain false doctrines, Gnostic for the most part, and erroneous moral tendencies concerning matrimony. The letter is evidence of the existence of bishops, priests or presbyters, and deacons. The first letter was written shortly after Timothy’s appointment as bishop. The second letter was written during Paul’s second Roman captivity and shortly before his death; it is a classic on the trials and ideals of the pastor’s life and an exhortation to combat heresy. The Biblical Commission, June, 1913, declared that the objections against the authenticity of these epistles are groundless.—C.E.; Prat, tr. Stoddard, The Theology of Saint Paul, N. Y., 1926. (Ed.)

Tithes, A.S. teotha, a tenth, in canon law, a tenth part of their goods and profits, which the faithful ought to give for the maintenance of religious services and for the support of the clergy. The law of tithes has undergone many changes and a general rule that would apply to all countries cannot be given. The positive law states that the peculiar statutes and laudable customs in each country regarding tithes should be observed (can. 1502). In English-speaking countries generally, the Catholic clergy receive no tithes; they are supported and other ecclesiastical institutions maintained chiefly by voluntary contributions of the faithful.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine.

Tithes, In Scripture, the tenth part of the income, or possessions, which is given as a tax, or offering, to a superior. In the patriarchal age Abraham pays the tithe to Melchisedech (Gen., 14); Jacob promises it to God for safe return to his father’s house (Gen., 28). The Pentateuch regulates the practise for the nation. Instead of the inheritance of land which was granted to the tribes, the Levites, as representatives of the Lord, were to receive the tenth part of the produce of the land, and of flocks, and cattle, from the rest of Israel (Num., 18; Lev., 27; Deut., 12). The Levites themselves were to offer to the priests the tenth part of the tithes received by them (Num., 18). Another kind of tithes was that taken from the yearly produce of the land, which was to be consumed at the sanctuary (Deut., 14); and that taken up every third year, and distributed in each place among the Levites and the poor (Deut., 14). Tithes were thus offered in acknowledgment of the dominion of the Lord, and as an expression of gratitude for the blessings received from God.—C.E. (E. A. A.)

Tintern Abbey, Monmouthshire, England, founded 1137 by Walter de Clare for Cistercian monks from the Abbey of Aumone. Suppressed and confiscated in 1536, it was granted to Henry, Earl of Worcester, 1537, and later acquired by the crown. The ruins are among the most beautiful in England.—C.E.

Tintoretto, Jr. (Jacopo Robusti; 1518-1594), painter, b. Venice; d. there. He was for a short time apprenticed to Titian but was mainly his own master. In order to realize his ideal, the drawing of Michelangelo and the coloring of Titian, he worked incessantly on anatomy, foreshortening, light and shade. A most prolific artist, he painted with such astonishing rapidity and impetuosity that he was nicknamed "Il furioso." Although he never quite equaled Michelangelo in draughtsmanship, nor Titian in color, his undoubted skill in both is unique. His masterpiece is "The Miracle of St. Mark," of the Academy of Venice, painted in 1548. Other notable achievements are the "Last Judgment" of the refectory of San Rocco, the "Forge of Vulcan," and the "Paradise" of the Doge’s Palace, the last the largest painting in the world. He was an acknowledged master of portraiture, one of his finest examples being the "Portrait of a Nobleman" in Christ Church Library, Oxford.—C.E.

Tinten, Mary Agnes (1833-1907), novelist, b. Ellsworth, Maine; d. Boston. She was a convert, and the author of "The House of Yorke," "Six Sunny Months," the fruit of her sojourn in Italy (1873-87), and "Grapes and Thorns," all of which struck a new note in Catholic literature.—C.E.
TITIAN

TITIAN (TIZIANO VEZELLI; c. 1487-1576), greatest of the Venetian painters, b. Pieve di Cadore, Italy; d. Venice. He was the pupil of Giovanni Bellini and was strongly influenced by Giorgione. He lived almost uninterruptedly in Venice and painted until the very end of his long life, his work being as amazing in quantity as in quality. One of his earliest works, “Sacred and Profane Love,” of the Borghese gallery in Rome, painted soon after 1512, shows the characteristics which make him one of the supreme artists of all time: mastery of technique, marvelous color, vigorous treatment. The last is one of the essential features of his “Assumption” painted for the church of the Frari in Venice, in 1516-18, and now in the Academy. Two other masterpieces of religious painting are the “Madonna of the Pesaro Family,” and the vast tableaux of the “Presen­ ation,” in the Academy. Of his mythological paintings two of the best known are the “Bacchus and Ariadne” of the National Gallery in London, painted in 1523 for Alfonso d’Este, and “The Rape of Europa,” in the Gardner collection, in Boston. ACHIRA

Titular Bishop, a consecrated bishop who bears the title of an ancient but now extinct episcopal see, in which he exercises neither the power of the Roman Court, honorary bishops, etc. The greater number of the sees are in Asia Minor, Syria, and Palestine, but there are many in Egypt, North Africa, the Balkan Peninsula, and Greece. After Mohammedanism had destroyed the Church in these countries, the extinct Catholic dioceses were usually called sees in partibus infidelium (in the lands of the infidels); but in 1882, on the representation of the Lutheran King George of Greece that his Orthodox Christian subjects were offended by the application of this phrase to ancient sees in Greece, Pope Leo XIII ordered that it be discontinued; they are now called titular sees.

The following table of the titular sees is based upon the “Annuaire Pontifical Catholique” of 1929, and also includes the short list of sees “likely to be soon conferred,” given in the “Annuaire” of 1927.

The first column gives the correct Latin name of the see; the second, the civil province of the Roman Empire in which it was situated; the third, the metropolitan titular see of which the given see is a suffragan; and the fourth, the present location, when known; where it is not known, the approximate location may be inferred from that of the metropolitan. Capital letters signify that the see itself is a metropolitan, the “metropolitan” column being then left blank, except in a few instances, like ATTALLA, temporarily made an archbishopric by the Holy See, but still theoretically subject to the metropolitan see of Perge.

TITUS

Titus, Epistle To. Titus, a native of Antioch, of pagan-Christian origin, was converted by Paul, and became one of his faithful associates. He was named Bp. of Crete, and Paul wrote to him about the heresies, Gnostic for the most part, which he had to combat, and about methods of church organization. The letter was written as Paul journeyed east after his first Roman imprisonment. The objections to its authenticity were pronounced unfounded by the Biblical Commission, June, 1913.— TITUS, XIV, 727; Prat, tr. Stoddard, The Theology of Saint Paul, N. Y., 1926. (ed.)

Titus, Saint, disciple of Saint Paul, and Bishop of Crete, d. 96. The Apostle sent him, c. 56, on a mission to Corinth to reform the Church there; he also ordained him Bishop of Crete, and in 64 addressed his Epistle to him, instructing him in the care of his flock. The See of Gortyna, occupied by Titus, was later transferred to Candia. Feast, 6 Feb.

Titus Oates. See Oates, Titus.

Tlaxcalteca Indians, also Tlaxteca or Tlaxteca, tribe of Nahua branch of Aztecs. At the time of the Spanish invasion of Mexico they had a republic and were at war with Montezuma, Aztec king. They formed an alliance with Cortés. From them the first Mexican bishopric was called Tlaxcala.

Tobias, Book of, a canonical book of the O.T. The Book of Tobias is a most interesting story about Tobias, an Israelite who was taken from Nephtali to Ninive by the Assyrians in the 8th century B.C., his son Tobias, and Sara, whom the younger Tobias marries at Ecbatana. The book is not recognized as a part of the Sacred Scriptures by the Jews and Protestants; but the Church has defined its inspiration. A few Catholic authors have treated the story as wholly or partly fictitious. Like the parable of Lazarus in the Gospel, they claim it was meant by its author only to convey religious and moral instruction. They find difficulty in reconciling certain data of the book with Assyrian history; and the discovery that Achior or Ahikar (Tob., 11) was a personage in a fictitious story of the Orient, was the first to show that the author did not intend the story to be historical.

Tobias the Elder (Heb., Jehovah is good), chief character in the Book of Tobias. He was a Jew of the tribe of Nephtali, and was carried to Ninive by Salmanasar, 722 B.C. Remarkable for his piety, his mercy to his fellow captives, and his resignation in trials, he lived to the age of 112 years and foretold the ruin of Ninive (Tob., 11).

Tobias the Younger, son of the above. The story of his journey to Media under the guidance of the angel Raphael is well known; he married his cousin Sara during the journey, and upon his return cured his father of his blindness (Tob., 4-11). He migrated to Ecbatana where he died.

Tocqueville, Charles Alexis Henri Maurice Clerel de (1805-59), writer and statesman, b. Verneuil, Department of Seine-et-Oise; d. Cannes. He was the great-grandson of Malesherbes, the defender of Louis XVI. He studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1825. In 1830 he accepted a government position which took him to America to study the workings of the democratic system. His letters show that he foresaw what strides the Church was destined to make in America. The result of his visit was the work, "Democracy in America," which won for him admission to the Academy of Moral Science (1838), and the French Academy (1841). De Tocqueville held that democracy could exist only by seeking a moral support in religion, and that religion could prosper only by accommodating itself to democracy; he is inclined to regard as too severe the doctrinal, disciplinary, and liturgical exactions of Catholicism, leaving the impression that he is only half Catholic. He took an active part in French politics, but returned to America, or to the Empire, and wrote "L'ancien régime et la révolution," of which only the first part appeared (1856), an interesting document on the evolution of the Liberal ideas of the middle of the 19th century.—C.E.

To Jesus' Heart, all burning, hymn written by Aloysius Schlör, and translated by F. A. Christie.

Toledo, Diocese of, Ohio, established in 1910; comprises that part of the state north of the southern limits of Richland, Crawford, Wyandot, Hancock, Allen, and Van Wert counties; area, 8222 sq. m.; suffragan of Cincinnati. Bishops: Joseph Schrems (1911-1921); Samuel Alphonsus Stritch (1921). Churches, 148; priests, secular, 190; parishes, 136; Oblates of the Most Holy Virgin, 12; college, 1; high schools, 24; elementary schools, 109; pupils in elementary schools, 23,744; institutions, 10; Catholics, 161,473.

Tolerance (Lat., tolerari, to bear with), disposition to permit or bear with views, actions, teachings, policies, different from one's own in political, social, educational, and especially in religious matters; the opposite of intolerance; the proper attitude to be maintained with regard to others, no matter how they may differ from ourselves, except when their tenets or conduct are a menace to the public welfare or to individual rights.

Toleration in Religion. Tolerance, in general, is an attitude of reasoned patience towards evil, and a forbearance which restrains us from showing anger or inflicting punishment. Tolerance has for its object an evil: a physical disease, an intellectual error, or a moral deformity. Tolerance when applied to religion does not mean indifference to creed, nor scepticism about religion, nor even an erroneous subjectivism which admits that one religion is just as good as another. There is no such thing as religious tolerance towards error, for truth is one, necessary, and immutable. Mathematicians, for example, must be intolerant about two and two making four, and by no stretch of imagination could a man be called "broad-minded" or tolerant because he held that two and two make five. If this is true in the natural order it is equally true in the supernatural order of revealed religion. It follows therefore that dogmatic tolerance is an impossibility, for truth and error cannot be put on an equal basis. The Catholic Church then cannot be called intolerant because she upholds the sacredness of truth, for truth admits of no compromise. In this sense the words of Leo XIII are to be understood: "The gravest obligation requires the acceptance and practise, not of the religion which one may choose, but of that which God prescribes and which can be known by certain and indubitable marks to be the only true Church." (Immortale Dei, 1 Nov., 1885).

Religious toleration, though it does not apply to doctrines or truths, does apply to the persons who hold the doctrines, or the erring. For that reason the Catholic Church refuses to impose her faith on others by force. On 18 Feb., 1705, the Holy Office expressly declared the illegality of baptizing the children of infidels against the will of the parents, and can. 750 of the New Code of Canon Law bears out this teaching. So far as the Church is concerned in the question of religious tolerance, we must distinguish between the heresy and the heretic. She is absolutely intolerant about the heresy, but tolerant about the heretic, for heresy affects, not personal matters on which charity may yield, but a Divine Right on which there is no yielding. Truth is Divine; the heretic is human, hence violence may be shown for the first and meekness for the latter. Due reparation made, the Church will receive any heretic back into the treasury of her souls, but not his heresy into the treasury of her wisdom.

Besides tolerance in religion on the part of the Church, there may be always tolerance in religion on the part of the State. The Catholic doctrine on this point has been well stated by Leo XIII as follows: "The Church indeed, deems it unlawful to place the different forms of worship on the same footing as the true religion. But it does not on that account condemn those rulers, who, for the sake of securing some great good, and hindering some great evil, patiently allow custom or usage to be a kind of sanction for each religion having its place in the State. And the Church is wont to take care that no person shall be forced to embrace the Catholic faith against his will, for Augustine wisely remarks: 'Man cannot believe otherwise than of his own free will.'" (Immortale Dei, 1 Nov., 1885). -C.E.; Vermeersch, tr. Page, Tolerance, Lond., 1913.

Tomb, a memorial for the dead at the place of burial. Tombs may be divided into four classes: the oldest Christian monuments, tombs with horizontal tombstones, including the stones or metal plates in the flooring of churches; the raised altar-tombs, with the deceased represented at full length; the mural tombs, set in a niche in the wall or raised upon some support; and hanging sepulchral monuments, especially prominent in the baroque and rococo periods.—C.E.

Tomb of the Blessed Virgin Mary, venerated in the Valley of the Cedron, near Jerusalem. Although a few writers point to the city of Ephesus as the burial place of the Blessed Virgin, yet all the early apocryphal works, touching on this, confirm the tradition that Our Blessed Lady died at Jerusalem and that there her Immaculate body rested until taken to Heaven in her glorious Assumption.—C.E. (K. M. W.)

Tongerloo Abbey, near Antwerp, Belgium; founded for the Norbertine monks, 1128, in honor of the Blessed Virgin, by De Giselbert. It became one of the most important abbeys in Belgium. In 1796 the religious were expelled and the abbey confiscated; after 1830 the community was revived. In April, 1929, fire destroyed the abbey church and other portions of the buildings. The monks have always engaged in educational work. In 1907 there were 43 religious, engaged in parish work, working in England and in the Congo missions.—C.E.

Tonsure (Lat., to shear), an ecclesiastical ceremony, by which a baptized and confirmed layman is made a cleric, admitted to the privileges of the clerical state, and prepared for the reception of Orders. A lock of hair is cut; in some countries a circle of hair is shorn regularly from the top of the head.—C.E. (R. B. M.)

Topcliffe, Richard (1532-1604), persecutor of Catholics, and priest-hunter, b. near Gainsborough, Lincolnshire, England; d. Padley, Derbyshire. He was a student at Gray’s Inn, and at Magdalene College, Cambridge. For 25 years or more he was most actively engaged in hunting out Jesuits and seminary priests, which procured him so much notoriety that he was called "the cruellest Tyrant of all England." He is especially noted for torturing Robert Southwell in his own home.

Totem (Heb., instruction), the teaching and judicial decisions given by the ancient Hebrew priests as a revelation of the Divine Will, the Mosaic or Jewish law, hence a name for the first five books of the law, the Pentateuch. Besides the written Torah, the Judaism which holds to tradition speaks of an oral Torah, the commentaries and ordinances which put into effect the laws contained in the Pentateuch. This oral Torah, it is claimed, was revealed to Moses and has been preserved in Israel by tradition.—C.E.

Toronto, Archdiocese of, Ontario; diocese, 1855; archdiocese, 1870; comprises Lincoln, Ontario, Peel, Simcoe, Welland, York, and Dufferin Counties; suffragans: Hamilton and London. Bishops: Michael Power (1842-47); Armand Francois Marie de Charbonnel (1850-60). Archbishops: John Joseph Lynch, C.1.L (1860-88); John Walsh (1888-98); Denis O'Connor, C.S.B. (1899-1908); Fergus Patrick McEvoy (1908-11); Neil McNeil (1912). Churches, 119; priests, secular, 143; priests, regular, 50; religious women, 906; colleges, 3; seminaries, 2; convents and academies, 15; elementary schools, 59; institutions, 9; Catholics, 125,000.

Torquemada, Tomás de (1429-98), first Grand Inquisitor of Spain; b. Valladolid; d. Avila. He became a Dominian in early youth, and later steadfastly refused ecclesiastical honors. His thorough organization of the Inquisition and his relentless persecution of the Marranos and Moriscos brought upon him the charge of cruelty, but he saved Christianity in Spain when it was seriously threatened by Mohammedans and Jews. As inquisitor he was instrumental in expelling the Jews from Spain.—C.E.

Toricelli, Evangelista (1608-47), Italian mathematician and physicist, b. Faenza; d. Florence. He was the successor of Galileo at the Florence Academy. He found the arc and center of gravity of the cyloid, invented the barometer, and discovered the law of efflux of a liquid through a small aperture in the wall of a vessel.—C.E.

Toscanelli, Paolo dal Pozzo (1397-1482), mathematician, astronomer, and cosmographer, b. Florence; d. there. His services to astronomy are shown in his painstaking and exact observations and calculations of the orbits of various comets, including Halley's. To his cosmographical knowledge and advice Columbus owed largely the discovery of America.—C.E.

Totemism, which is widespread and which developed among the American Indians and the aborigines of Australia, constitutes the group of superstitions and customs of which the totem is the center. It is defined as the intimate relation supposed to exist between an individual or a group of individuals and a class of natural objects, i.e., the totem. The former regard the latter as identified with them in a mystical manner, and in a peculiar sense their own possession, so that they bear the name of the totem and show this belief in certain customs. The conviction of the intimate union connecting the religious aspect of totemism with the customs which result therefrom form its sociological aspect. If the union exists between an individual and a class of natural objects, it is known as individual totemism; when it exists between a clan and a natural class it is known as clan totemism.—C.E.; Frazer, Totemism and Exogamy, Lond., 1920.

Toungoo, Vicariate Apostolic of (formerly Eastern Burma); divided into two parts by the Salween River; entrusted to the Foreign Missionaries of Milan; established, 1870, by detachment from the former Vicariate of Burma; name changed in 1927. Vicar Apostolic: F. Emmanuel Segrada (1908). Churches and chapels, 161; priests, 23; religious women, 35; orphanages, 15; parochial schools, 70; pupils in academies and schools, 3001; orphans, 15; Catholics, 224,503.

Tower of Babel. It is related in Gen., 11, how the descendants of Noe finally settled in the plain of Semmar or Babylonia and there built of brick a city and a tower supposedly to reach heaven, as a monument to preserve their fame and as a center of social union. The building of this tower is placed between 101 and 870 years after the Flood. The exact site of the tower is uncertain; the more common opinion identifies it with the Birs-Nimrud ruins west of the Euphrates and originally within the city limits of Babylon. Today these ruins still reach a height of about 300 feet. The form of the tower most probably resembled that of other Babylonian constructions: square, with the corners facing the points of the compass, and each succeeding story being somewhat smaller so as to make the structure pyramidal. The Birs-Nimrud tower had seven such stories, each one dedicated to one of the seven planets gods and painted in a different color. As to the confusion of languages at Babel, the Bible mentions expressly a Divine intervention, the cause of which was human pride. Some authors hold that the confusion of languages was effected by God miraculously, and thence arose misunderstanding and the duties of a Christian life through the preaching of the Apostles and their co-workers. Much of this teaching was not written down, for it is patent that neither the Evangelists nor St. Paul meant to write a complete and exhaustive exposition of the Christian faith and practise. Hence, in the first centuries of Christianity, Christians continued to do what had been done during Apostolic times, that is, to depend on the oral teachings of their bishops and priests in order to know the truths revealed by God. It is worthy of note that in all the controversies with heretics the first defenders of the Faith took their stand on Tradition even more than on the Bible. A goodly part of this oral teaching was gradually given expression in the writings of the Fathers of the Church, the Liturgical books containing prayers and ceremonies used in the celebration of the Eucharist, the administration of the Sacraments, and in inscriptions in churches, tombs and other Christian monuments. From these it is possible in many cases to ascertain with certainty the belief of the Church of the first four centuries. When Catholic theologians seek to prove the doctrines of the Church from tradition, the word is taken in a restricted sense and means what we find in the existing records concerning the faith of the early Church. However, these documents do not contain a complete and fully developed exposition of all the truths of faith. The Holy Ghost assisted the Church from the beginning, and assists her still, in preserving faithfully the deposit of faith and in drawing out its full meaning. It has ever been and will always remain the office of the Living Church with the assistance of the Holy Spirit to hand down to the end of the world the doctrines revealed by God.——C. E.

Traditionalism (Lat., traditio, a handing down), a philosophical system which, in its strictest form, denies unaided human reason power to attain certain knowledge of truth, or at least extends this impiety to the metaphysical, moral, and religious order. The sole source and criterion of truth is a primitive Divine Revelation transmitted through the universal traditions of all mankind. In this form the system was propounded by De Bonald (1754-1840), and De Lamennais (1782-1854). According to the former, language is a necessary prerequisite to thought, and hence was bestowed by the Creator, with the thoughts and truths which it expresses; later Baudin claimed that human reason could substantiate this traditional truth. Historically this system was a reaction against 18th-century rationalism and individualism, as well as a desperate attempt to secure a firm foundation for such truths as the immortality of the soul, and existence of God. It was condemned by the Church, and is today generally rejected as arbitrary in its assumptions, and offering an unsound motive of certitude.——C. E.; Riekaby, First Principles of Knowledge, Lond., 1901.——(J. A. B.)

Traditores (Lat., traitores, to give up), term applied to those Christians (mostly clerics), who, during the persecution of Diocletian and in obedience to his edict, surrendered “the Holy Scriptures or the vessels of the Lord, or the names of their brethren.”
Toward the Christians, and although there were beyond this to apply thelll to supra-sensual reality:

"Christ meant above all to take away the scandal of the Cross from the hearts of His disciples." The latter were downcast at the prediction of Christ's sufferings and death. It was necessary to comfort them. Our Lord wished to impress upon their minds the fact that the Divine programme was made of two parts: the Cross, indeed, but also the glory of the Resurrection. In the Transfiguration, He gives them a glimpse of His Glory, allowing His Divine life to appear through the lowly condition of servant, and showing thereby that even now He has a right to the heavenly glory which will be His when He assumes His divine state. They should therefore be reconciled with the idea of His sufferings, since it is not to be the definitive state of the Messiah, but the necessary prelude to His glory. On that occasion also, the two most illustrious representatives of the O.T., Moses and Elias, adore the Son of Man: the Law and the Prophets pay their homage to the New Covenant. Jesus, Moses, and Elias speak together of the Death and the Resurrection, the two stages of "of His decease that He should accomplish in Jerusalem" (Luke, 9). It was proper that the Cross, a scandal to the Jews, should be hailed by the greatest representatives of Judaism.

A tradition, which is first mentioned by St. Cyril of Jerusalem, places the scene of the Transfiguration on Mount Tabor. Recently, however, biblical scholars generally have rejected this tradition, saying the feast of the Transfiguration is celebrated 6 August. It originated in the 4th or 5th centuries in Asia, and is still one of the great Armenian feasts, lasting for three days and preceded by a six-day fast. In the Greek Church it has a vigil and an octave. It was adopted by the Latin Church about 856, was included in the liturgy during the 10th century and extended to the universal Church by Pope Callistus III, 1456, in memory of the Turkish defeat at Belgrade in that year. On this day the Pope uses new wine at Mass, or presses a bunch of wild grapes into the chalice; raisins are also transplanted, a philosophical error which holds that the soul of the offspring originates by transmission from the parent. The doctrine takes a multitude of forms. Material traducianism claims that the soul is the result of a material seed, either identical with or largely akin to the material principle of corporeal generation. Spiritual traducianism, on the other hand, holds that a spiritual seed, excised perhaps from the spiritual souls of the parents, is the instrument whereby the soul is produced. In neither of these forms does traducianism square with the principles of sound philosophy. The Catholic doctrine of direct creation by God Himself of each individual soul diametrically opposes the pernicious tenets of traducianism.—C.E. (H. A. S.)

Transfiguration. As St. Leo said (Sermon 49):

"Christ meant above all to take away the scandal
vellous and singular changing of the entire substance of bread into the entire substance of the Body of Christ, and of the entire substance of the wine into His Blood, the accidents only of bread and wine remaining in the Sacrament of the Eucharist. Hildebert of Tours (c. 1097) seems to be the first writer to employ the word. See Eucharist.

Treasury of the Church, or TREASURY OF MERIT, consists of the superabundant merits of Jesus Christ and His Saints. Since the merits of Christ are infinite, they constitute an inexhaustible fund over which the Church has full powers. It is out of this treasure that indulgences are granted.

Tree, Good AND BAD, figure used in several parables (Matt., 7, 12; Luke, 6). The image of a tree and its fruits, to represent character and works, was familiar to the Jews from Scripture. In the Sermon on the Mount (Matt., 7), the parable is a warning against false prophets. Christ particularizes: “Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs from thistles?” In Matt., 12, the parable is directed against the Pharisees. Two ways of exegesis are equally old: (1) Person and work correspond as do tree and fruit; How dare you say that I do good deeds (casting out devils) by Beelzebub? “Either make the tree good and its fruit good: or make the tree evil and its fruit evil.” (2) According to St. Augustine; “O generation of vipers, how can you speak good things whereas you are evil!” means: You cannot find my threats too severe (“be that shall speak against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him”); your fruit shows that God is justified in refusing further graces (Serm. 72). The conclusion is similar to Luke, 6: “A good man out of the good treasure of his heart bringeth forth that which is good,” and vice versa; but the application in Luke is somewhat different. Here Christ means that nobody should undertake to teach who cannot point to his own example, the lesson being strengthened by the parable of the mote and beam which immediately precedes, and by the query which follows: “Why call you me, Lord, Lord; and do not the things which I say?”—Fonck, tr. Leahy, The Parables of the Gospel, N. Y., 1915.

Tree of Jesse, symbolic representation of the Blessed Virgin Mary, inspired by the prophecy, “And there shall come forth a rod out of the root of Jesse, and a flower shall rise up out of his root . . .” Jesse was a patriarch of the royal family; the rod symbolizes Mary. The Tree of Jesse first appeared in art at the end of the 11th century. Medieval artists combined the verses of Isaiah with the genealogy of St. Matthew’s Gospel, and represented a tree sprouting from the side of sleeping Jesse. In the branches are figures of the kings of Judah, the Blessed Virgin, and Christ with seven doves. The gallery of the kings, in many 13th-century cathedrals, is another form of the Jesse Tree. Suger, Abbot of St. Denis, coordinated the Tree from a 10th-century mystery play, and to him we owe the representations at Chartres, York, Rouen, Hildesheim, St. Denis, and in countless manuscripts. Gradually the tree terminated in a symbolic lily, as is seen in the church of Saint Etienne de Beauvais.

Tree of Knowledge, the particular tree in the Garden of Paradise, of whose fruit, by God’s formal and clearly understood protest, Adam and Eve were forbidden to eat. God’s precept was the test of their obedience as creatures. By violating His law and eating of the forbidden fruit, they committed grievous personal sin, and realized in the terrible conse­quences that ensued the bitter futility of sin and the priceless heritage they had lost. (R. J. Mcl.)

Trent, Council of, the Nineteenth Ecumenical Council, opened 13 December, 1545, in the pontifi­cate of Pope Paul III, at Trent, a city in sw. Ty­ rol, and closed there 4 December, 1563, in the pontificate of Pope Pius IV. The aim of the council was to define the Catholic doctrine against the heresies of the Protestants, and to bring about a genuine reform within the Church by removing the abuses which had crept in. Decrees were passed, among others, on the dogmas of original sin, justification, the sacraments; on the veneration of the saints; and on indulgences. The decrees of reform concerned episcopal jurisdiction, the obligation of residence of bishops and occupants of ecclesiastical offices, the legal affairs of the clergy, their morals, and the education of seminarians. It would be hard to exaggerate the importance of the Council of Trent. The subsequent history of the Church, espe­ cially the Catholic Revival, shows how well it suc­ceeded.—C. F. M.

Tribes, Jewish. According to Genesis, 49, the 12 sons of Jacob are the founders of the Israelitic nation. Their descendants formed 12 social units, known as the 12 tribes of Israel. Strictly speaking there were 13 tribes: Ruben, Simeon, Levi, Juda, Issachar, Zabulon, Dan, Nephthali, Gad, Aser, Benjamin, and the two sons of Joseph, Ephraim and Manasses, whom Jacob adopted as his own (Gen., 461). Each tribe assumed its distinctive name from the district of territory in which it resided. It was generally speaking, each tribe was independent of the others, and was governed by its own ancients: for itself (Jos., 15; Judges, 1), sometimes, how­ever, in union with neighboring tribes. Against a common enemy, various tribes would unite for itself (Jos., 15; Judges, 1), sometimes, how­ever, in union with neighboring tribes. coverers and Catholicity was first preached in Trinidad by two Dominicans, Frs. Francisco de Cordova and Juan Garces, who were slaughtered by the Indians, 1513. Then they were followed by the Franciscans, who arrived in 1596, and remained until the British occupation in 1707. The year 1699 saw the martyrdom of Frs. Esteban de San Felix, Marco de Vique, and a lay brother Ramon de Figueroa, Franciscans, who were killed by the natives. The governor of the colony, Don Jose de Leon, and a Dominican, Fr.
Juan de Mosin Sotomayor, were murdered defending the remains of these martyrs. Missionary work was continued by the Dominicans until they were replaced by secular clergy. Under British rule the Catholic Church remained unmolested and the government contributes to the support of the clergy.
Until 1829 the island was under the jurisdiction of the Bp. of Guiana, Venezuela, but in that year Mgr.
James Buckley was consecrated the first bishop. In 1864 the Dominicans returned to resume their work of evangelization. Ecclesiastically Trinidad belongs to the Archdiocese of Port of Spain (q.v.), which has its episcopal seat on this island.

Trinity, Blessed (Lat., tria, three each, or threefold), the term used as early as the days of Tertullian (c. A.D. 200) to denote the central doctrine of the Christian religion. God, who is one and unique in His infinite substance or nature, or Godhead, is three really distinct Persons, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. Each of these Persons is truly the same God, and has all His infinite perfessions, yet He is really distinct from each of the other Persons. The one and only God is the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost; yet God the Father is either the Father nor the Son, but begots the Son eternally, as the Son is eternally begotten. The Holy Ghost is neither of the Father nor the Son, but a distinct Person having His Divine nature from the Father and the Son by eternal procession. To illustrate this inscrutable mystery of God's inner life (made known by Christ and Christian Revelation, and defined by the Church of Christ) the Father engenders the Son as His spiritual image, or Word, conceived by His infinite and eternal thought, while the Holy Ghost issues forth eternally as the personal term of the infinite act of mutual love of the Father and the Son. Thus the unique and indivisible Godhead subsists in three Persons, Who are constituted by distinct internal Divine relations. These Persons are co-equal, co-eternal, and consubstantial, and deserve co-equal glory and adoration, which the Church expresses in the often repeated prayer: "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost."—C.F.;

Trinity, Confraternity of the Most Holy, pious association of laymen, founded by St. Philip Neri, to care for pilgrims and convalescents. Its members meet for Communion, prayer, and other spiritual exercises, and the saint himself introduced exposition of the Blessed Sacrament once a month.
The badge of the Confraternity of the Most Holy Trinity is a small white scapular with a blue and red cross and must be worn constantly.

Trinity, Symbols of the. A triangle containing an eye is a symbol of the Triune God and of the all-seeing eye of the Deity. A shamrock is also an emblem of the Trinity, from the legend of St. Patrick, who is said to have instructed the Irish people concerning the three Persons in one God by the three leaves of this plant. (J. P. S.)

Trinity Sunday, the first Sunday after Pentecost, instituted to honor the Most Holy Trinity. The early Church did not honor the Trinity by a special Office or day. When the Arian heresy was at its height, an Office with canticle, responses, a Preface, and hymns was composed by the Fathers, and recited on Sundays. Bp. Stephen of Liege (903-20) wrote an Office of the Holy Trinity which was recited in some places on the Sunday after Pentecost, in others on the Sunday preceding Advent. St.
Thomas Becket, consecrated Abp. of Canterbury on the Sunday following Pentecost, obtained for England the privilege of honoring the Holy Trinity on that day, and Pope John XXII (1316-34) made this practice universal. A Plenary Indulgence is gained by those who receive the Holy Eucharist on this day. The Gospel of the Mass is the charge of Christ to His Apostles to teach all nations “baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.” It is the last day in the United States for the observance of what is known as the Easter duty, so called because it is of obligation for all Catholics to confess and partake of Holy Communion once a year, usually between the first Sunday of Lent and Trinity Sunday.—C.E.; Kellner,

Triple Candle. After the “blessing of the new

Tritheists (Gr., tritos, three, gods, God), heretics who divide the Substance of the Blessed Trinity, so that each of the Divine Persons has a nature not specifically but numerically distinct from the nature of both the other Persons. This doctrine was held by a group of Monophysites of the 6th century under the leadership of two bishops, Conon of Tarsus and Eugenius of Scilucia, with John Philoponus as the principal writer of the school. The Catholic patriarch, John Scholasticus (565-77), condemned the doctrine and banished the two bishops who then proceeded to propagate the heresy in Corinth, Athens, Rome, and Africa. In later times, this heresy was revived, notably by Rosequin in the Middle Ages, by Canon Oeems of Trier in the 18th century, and by Günther in the last century. Oeems's book was condemned by Pius VII in a brief of 14 July, 1804, and Günther's false views by Pius IX in a Brief of 15 June, 1857.—C.E. (M. J. sm.)

Triune (Lat., tres, three; unus, one), a title applied to God by reason of His threefold Personality. This term emphasizes the unity of the Divine nature, as the plurality of Persons is stressed by the term Trinity.

Trophimus, disciple and companion of the Apostle of the Gentiles, b. Ephesus. He was converted from paganism to Christianity through the efforts of Saint Paul; and was the unsuspecting cause of the tumult at Jerusalem in which Saint Paul was taken prisoner. The Jews erroneously thought that Paul had brought Trophimus into the Temple. Later Trophimus being ill was left by Saint Paul at Miletus. (Acts, 21; 2 Tim., 4).

Truth, a term of several meanings, all of which imply the relation of something extramental to something mental. Logical truth is a quality of judgments, and consists in the conformity of a mental representation to an objective reality. Thus, a man's judgment is true, or correct, when it corresponds to a fact or thing as it is. Ontological truth is a quality of things, and consists in the conformity of an object to something mental, such as a definition or an abstract type. We speak of true gold, i.e., genuine gold, which corresponds to the Truce of God, temporary suspension of hostilities as distinct from the Peace of God, which is perpetual. It dates from the 11th century and was imposed by the Church under threat of excommunication upon the armed bands engaged in fighting private wars. Hostilities were forbidden from Saturday night to Monday morning, and subsequently on certain days of the week, viz., Thursday, in memory of the Ascension, and Friday, the day of the Passion, and in Advent and Lent.—C.E.; Guggenberger, General History of the Christian Era, I, St. L., 1919.

Trudo (Tron, Trond, Trudon, Trutjen), Saint, confessor (c. 630-95), apostle of Hasbien in Brabant. He was the son of Blessed Adela. Educated and ordained by St. Chlodulf, 655, he returned to his native land and built a church and abbey at Sarchinium, also a convent for men at Odeghem near Bruges. Feast, 23 Nov.—C.E.; Butler.

True Cross, The, cross on which Our Lord suffered, very probably discovered by the aged Empress St. Helena, mother of the Emperor Constantine, in the year 326. Sts. Ambrose, Augustine, and Cyril of Jerusalem testify to the finding, and therefore it may be considered a historical fact, but the accounts of miracles and other occurrences are merely traditional and probably only legendary. A part of the True Cross was brought by the empress to Rome, and is said to be preserved there in the church of Santa Croce. The Church celebrates two festivals of the True Cross, the Finding, on 3 May, and the Exaltation, on 14 Sept.

True Voice, The, weekly newspaper published in Omaha, Neb., by priests of the diocese; founded, 1903; circulation, 6100.

Trust, confidence; an act or habit of the soul resulting from the practise of the three theological virtues, faith, hope, and charity. By faith we know God as Creator, Redeemer, Father. His love and mercy; by hope we rely on Him with firm hope and so become confident or trustful of His grace while on the way of life's pilgrimage, and of His reward when our time of trial is over.—Loyola, Trust, Lond., 1928. (Ed.)

Trustee System, a means frequently made use of by the Church whereby deputies are appointed for the proper administration of property belonging to a benefice or any moral person. These deputies or trustees may be of the clergy or laity and together with the legitimate ecclesiastical superior, form what is canonically known as the council for the "fabric" of the church. This board of trustees must give an account of their stewardship periodically to the pastor, under the bishop, those of the parish. Each may create a board of trustees, but those pertaining to the parish church are to be appointed by the bishop, or his delegate, unless it is otherwise stated by local law (Can. 1520; 1183). The Third Plenary Council of Baltimore forbids pastors to appoint trustees without the consent of the bishop, and lays down other regulations regarding meetings, reports, etc. (n. 284-287). Canon 1184 commands trustees to take due care of church funds, but in no way to interfere in the spiritual administration of the parish. In the United States during the past the enlisting of the aid of laymen, as sole trustees, has been the source of much dissension at times, but the Holy See has declared that the vesting of church property in a board of trustees comprising, e.g., the bishop, his vicar general, the pastor, and two laymen, is a preferable legal form. Civil laws pertaining to the trustees of a church here in the United States differ little in the various states.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine. (W. J. M.)

chemist's formula. So, also, we refer to a true saint, a true Rembrandt, meaning that these things conform to a certain mental standard or ideal. Ethical truth, veracity, is the conformity of expression, either of statement or of action, with thought.

Tryphon, SAINT, martyr (c. 250), b. Kampsade, Phrygia; d. Nicea. He was a gooseherd in his native village, and after converting the prefect Lycius, he was brought to Nicea, subjected to cruel tortures and put to death. The account of the martyrdom, written by the monk, Theodoric of Neumina, a virgin of Palermo, martyred for the faith (4th century). Tryphon is patron of gardeners; invoked against evil spirits and insects. The relics of the three saints are said to be in the Hospital of the Santo Spirito in Sassia, Rome; the Church of Cattaro in Dalmatia also claims to possess the relics of Tryphon. Feast, R. Cal., 10 Nov.—C.E.; Butler.

Tuam, Archdiocese of, Ireland, comprises half of Mayo, nearly half of Galway, and part of Roscommon; suffragan sees: Achonry, Clonfert, Elphin, Galway, Killala, and Kilmacduagh and Killala, St. Patrick, founded about 12 churches in the district, in several of which he placed bishops. The original diocese of Tuam was founded by St. Jarlath, c. 520, who established the noted school of Tuam, a Celtic art center in the 11th century. Of the ancient dioceses which were united with Tuam five constitute the territory of the modern archdiocese. The Protestant cathedral occupies the site of the original monasteries of Annaghdown, Cong, Mayo, Aran (St. Enda), Knocknacoy, the oratory of Tempull Renain on Aran, and the Benedictine convent of Kilcrevacany. Hugh O'Hennessy became first Abp. of Tuam (1192). Noted among his successors were Cathal O'Duffy (d. 1292), William de Bermond (appointed, 1289), Malachy O'Queely (17th century), John MacHale (1834-81), John MacEvilly (1881-1902), John Healy (1903-18), Thomas Gilmartin (1918). Churches, 123; priests, secular, 144; priests, regular, 7; college, 1; high schools, 7; numerous primary schools; institutions, 9; Catholics, 184,419; others, 3,370.

Tübingen, University of, in Württemberg, founded by Count Eberhard in Bart, 1477, after a Bull of authorization was granted by Pope Sixtus IV, 1476, who endowed it from church property. It was composed of the four faculties of theology, law, medicine, and philosophy. Despite its stubborn resistance, the Reformation was introduced into the university, 1535. In 1817 the Catholic university for Württemberg was transferred from Ellwangen to Tübingen where it was established as the Catholic theological faculty, and a Catholic house of studies was founded to counterbalance the Lutheran seminary. Notable among the Catholic theologians was Johann Adam Möhler. Students, 2679.—C.E.

Tunstall, Cuthbert, archbishop. Theological faculty, and a Catholic house of studies were founded to counterbalance the Lutheran seminary. Notable among the Catholic theologians was Johann Adam Möhler. Students, 2679.—C.E. (R. B. M.)

Turibius, Saint (1538-1606), Abp. of Lima, b. Mayorga, Spain; d. near Lima, Peru. Of a noble family, he was well educated, and was made professor of laws at Salamanca. In 1575 Philip II appointed him Grand Inquisitor of Peru and in 1580 Abp. of Lima. During his missionary work in Peru he traversed 50,000 miles in his diocese, baptizing, teaching, and confirming the natives. He founded the first American seminary, and assembled 13 diocesan synods, and 3 provincial councils. Represented giving alms. Canonized, 1726. Feast, 26 April.

Turkey, republic of Asia Minor and Europe; area, 494,535 sq. m.; pop. (1927), 13,049,945. Sts. Peter, Paul, John, Ignatius of Antioch, and other very early missionaries preached in Asia Minor, and the Church there became illustrious for countless martyrs as well as for eminent theologians, e.g., Sts. Polycarp, Irenaeus, Gregory Thaumaturgus, Methodius of Olympus, Basil the Great, and Gregory of Nyssa. In general the churches used the liturgy of Antioch. When Byzantium (Constantinople) was made capital of the Roman Empire, 330, by Constantine the Great, it was the see of a diocese suffragan to Heraclea in Thrace. With the increasing importance of the city, the newly created Patriarchate of Constantinople became more and more influential: its patriarch held the first place of honor after the Bp. of Rome. By the end of the 9th century the patriarchate included 624 dioceses, more than the number belonging directly to the Patriarchate of Rome; but throughout its history successive heresies and schisms involved conflict among its own churches or with Rome. In 1054 it separated from Rome and the Eastern Church became the state church of the Byzantine Empire. It was weakened by internal dissension, and the entire country suffered from invasions by Persians, Arabs, and Turks. From the end of the 11th century many Crusaders passed this way, setting up temporary governments in some places and having slight success in their efforts to unite the Eastern Christians with Rome. Before the end of the 15th century the Byzantine Empire was finally conquered by Turks. Most of the churches of Constantinople were made into mosques. The Turkish Empire continued to grow by conquests in Asia, Europe, and Africa, reaching its widest extent late in the 16th century. Until recent years Turkey has been ruled absolutely by a sultan who, until 1922, was also caliph, i.e., spiritual head, claiming authority over the Mohammedans of the world. Toleration of other religions has varied greatly; at some times Christians, particularly Armenians, have been severely persecuted. In recent times the non-Moslem inhabitants of Turkey were organized into millets, i.e., communities in which the spiritual heads had considerable civil authority. In 1923 the heads of the millets were deprived of all but their spiritual authority; the status of non-Moslems has changed and is still uncertain. At the same time the Christian population is becoming greatly reduced by emigration, especially of Armenians and Greeks, and replacement of them by Turks from Greece. The Constitution of 1924 declares Islam the state religion. The non-Moslem population includes chiefly Jews and Christians, schismatic or Uniat, of several rites. Those of different rites, while living in the same place, are subject to different bishops. As some of these bishops are not resident in Turkey, and as some of the bishops in Turkey, whose sees only are listed below, administer territory extending into other countries, the following Catholic statistics do not correspond exactly to the population included within the present boundaries of Turkey.

Twilight Sleep, an anesthetic treatment employed in obstetrical cases, which features an initial hypodermic injection of solutions of scopolamine and morphine, and successive injections of scopolamine during childbirth. The method was inaugurated at Freiburg by August Karl König and Karl Friedrich Gauss. The treatment in cases of normal childbirth is morally wrong, as the alleviation of pain entails danger to the life of mother and child, or permanent injury to either. In exceptional cases where organic troubles seriously threaten the life of the mother it may be employed, although the child may be indirectly threatened. Other methods reduce pain but endanger neither mother nor child.

_Tyburn and Smithfield Compared_, an estimate of Protestant and Catholic claims of persecution as typified by Protestant emphasis on Smithfield, the scene of executions of Protestants in the old city of London, England, and ignoring Tyburn, where, among other places, Catholics suffered for the Faith. The site of Tyburn is some distance from the ancient city, at the intersection of Oxford Street and Edgware Road, the modern names of two ancient Roman roads. Such ancient crossroads have been used as places of execution immemorially. The exact spot is indicated by a brass plate in the surface of the roadway, of what is probably the busiest street-crossing in the world. According to Lingard, the “reformed” writers have emphasized the sufferings and exaggerated the number of Mary’s Protestant victims (at Smithfield), chief among whom were Cranmer, Latimer, and Ridley, many actual felons and traitors being dubbed martyrs (Lingard, V, 238). Elizabeth’s and Henry’s conduct is shown to be merciless and deliberately unjust; Elizabeth murdered (at Tyburn and in the Tower) Catholics, Puritans, and Anabaptists without end, and the inhuman brutalities of Henry are described by Protestant writers merely as “severe punishments” (“Britain and Her Neighbors”), whereas there is nothing comparable to them in Mary’s reign. In most histories the atrocities of Elizabeth have been glazed over, and the executions under Mary exaggerated and misjudged. According to Lingard, Mary lived in an age of religious intolerance; she had persecuted in abuse; priests, under Mary, were assaulted in the pulpit, and at the communion rail; whereas Catholics, under Elizabeth, accepted their fate for the most part meekly. On the other hand, if the reign of Mary was not free from the abuses of the time those of Henry, of Elizabeth, and of Cromwell were characterized by an excess of brutality in which the ground was, literally, saturated with Catholic blood. So non-partisan a historian as Lingard emphasizes the comparison between Protestant and Catholic persecution in the fact that many, who, in the words of Cardinal Gibbons, have been familiar with the name of Smithfield from boyhood, have never even heard of Tyburn, know Mary only as “bloody Mary,” and remember Elizabeth only as “the virgin queen.”—Gibbons, _The Faith of Our Fathers_, N.Y., 1929; Chaudhry, _From Tower to Tyburn_, Lond., 1924; Lingard, _History of England_, abridged by Birt, V, VI, Lond., 1914; _Historical Text-Books and Readers_, Lond., 1927.

_Tychicus_, saint, a disciple of St. Paul, b. probably Ephesus, Asia Minor. He accompanied St. Paul on his third missionary journey, shared his first Roman captivity, and was sent to Asia as the bearer of the Epistles to the Colossians and Ephesians. Nothing certain is known of his subsequent career, although many cities claim him as their bishop. Feast, 29 April.—C.E.

_Tyburn Priory_, in Cumberland, England, occupied the site of an earlier Saxon church; granted to the Benedictine monks of Yarrow, 1074, and annexed to Durham Abbey. Later it became a cell of St. Albans. The last prior was Robert Blakeney, under whose rule the priory was con ciscated by Henry VIII, 1539. The roofless chancel, one of the most beautiful fragments of 13th-century architecture in England, is all that is now left.—C.E.

_Types in Scripture_ are based upon the relation of biblical persons, objects or events, to new truths, which they foreshadow, called antitypes. The typical sense is often called the spiritual or mystical sense of the Scripture. The Holy Ghost expresses it by means of the literal, and uses the antitype, or type, of Holy Writ, i.e., the words of Scripture signify persons, objects or events, and in turn these persons, objects, or events, signify others. A type has a historical existence independent of the antitype; e.g., the priesthood of Melchisedech would be a fact, even if Christ had not become the Priest of the New Law. Type and antitype are only imagery, and from symbolic action, which is done solely to symbolize. A likeness must exist between a type and its antitype, although the latter is the greater. St. Matthew uses the typical sense when he quotes: “Out of Egypt have I called my son” (Osee, 11), as fulfilled in Christ’s return from Egypt. The literal sense of the prophet’s words is that God called the Israelites. His adopted sons, out of the Egyptian bondage. The historical fact of their release from bondage typifies the return of the Son of God from His flight into Egypt (Matt., 2).—C.E.; Schmahaler. (H. J. G.)

_Tyrannicide_ (Lat., tyrannus, tyrant; omne, to kill), the killing of a tyrant by a private person for the common good. There are two kinds of tyrants: a tyrant by usurpation, and a tyrant by oppression. The former actually attacks the established powers of a community, acting against the commonweal. Like any other criminal, therefore, a tyrant by usurpation may be put to death by legitimate authority. If possible, the legitimate authority must use the ordinary process of law in putting a tyrant to death, but if this is not possible, the legitimate authority can grant individuals the mandate and the right to inflict capital punishment on the tyrant. Without such a mandate, either tacit or expressed, no private person can lawfully kill a usurper unless he becomes an actual unjust aggressor. If a usurper has already established a rule, and peacefully reigns, the lawful ruler may nevertheless expel him by force, if he can do so, and punish him with death for his previous offense. If a legitimate ruler can evidently not overthrow a usurping tyrant he must submit to the actual state of affairs and refrain from warfare. Subjects are bound under such circumstances to obey the just laws of the realm and can lawfully take an oath of allegiance to the ruling tyrant, if the oath is not of such a nature as to acknowledge the legitimacy of his authority. A tyrant of oppression, according to eminent old theologians like St. Thomas, Bañez, and Suarez, could, if no other means were available, be vigorously opposed by rebellion, provided the safety of the state and communities was in constant jeopardy. Suarez held that the state, but not private persons, could, if necessary, put such a tyrant to death. Catholic authors of recent times, however, deny that subjects have the right to rebel against and depose an unjust ruler, unless he were elected or appointed under the condition of forfeiting his office in case of unjust ruling and abuse of power. Many Catholic writers, such as Cathrein, Zigliara, Crolly, admit the right of subjects to offer passive and also active defensive resistance to actual aggression and unjust laws even of a legitimate, but oppressive, ruler. Luther, Melanchthon, Junius Brutus (a Calvinist writer), John Knox, and many other reformers were more or less in favor of tyrannicide. The Catholic Church condemns tyrannicide as opposed to the natural law. The personal opinion of the Jesuit Mariana in his book, "De rege et regis institutione" (Toledo, Spain, 1599), was never sanctioned by the Church nor by the Society of Jesus. John of Salisbury in the 12th century and John Parvus (Jehan Petit) in the 15th were overruled by the Council of Constance (1415), which condemned as contrary to faith and morals the killing of a tyrant by a vassal or subject, openly or secretly (Sess. 15).—C.E.; Rickaby, Moral Philosophy, Lond., 1909.

Tyre (Heb., zor, rock), an ancient city of Phenicia, 50 m. s. of Beirut, dating from about the 28th century B.C. Proverbial for its wealth and pride among the prophets of Israel and Moab, Tyre was captured in 332 by Alexander, and during the Roman period was a colony under Septimius Severus. Later as the capital of Phenicia, it became famous for its purple cloth. Our Lord visited it and cast an evil spirit out of a woman (Mark, 7). A Christian community was formed there which Sts. Paul and Luke visited, remaining seven days (Acts, 21), but bitter persecution retarded the Faith until the conversion of Eusebius of Cæsarea, about the 4th century. Three councils were held at Tyre, in 335, 449, and 515. A Frankish possession during the Crusades, in 1516 the Turks occupied it, and have held it ever since. Among the celebrated natives of Tyre are: Ulpianus, the jurisconsult (d. 228); Porphyry (Maleclus); Origens; St. Theodorus; St. Frumentius; and William II, archbishop, and historian of the Crusades. It is now a caza in the vilayet of Beirut, Syria, and a see of three rites: a Latin titular see; a Melchite archdiocese (11th century) having 5270 Catholics, 16 priests and 14 churches and chapels; and a Maronite diocese (1906) with 10,000 Catholics, 28 priests, and 20 churches.

Tyrrell, George (1861-1909), writer, b. Dublin. Educated at Rathmines School and Trinity College, he became a Catholic in 1879. In 1880 he entered the Society of Jesus, passed his novitiate at Manresa and other houses of the Order, and taught philosophy at Stonyhurst. In his writings, which include "Hard Sayings," "Lex Orandi," "Lex Credendi," "The Faith of the Millions," "Oil and Wine," and "Christianity at the Cross Roads," he always artfully veiled his heretical tendencies. His "Medievalism," was a reply to Cardinal Mercier, who called him the chief exponent of modernism. To attempt to pervert his Jesuit companions and his friends outside the Order was characteristic, and his superiors felt compelled to expel him. In Sept., 1907 he was excommunicated for an arrogant criticism of the Encyclical, "Pascendi Gregis," condemning modernism. His biography is a strange exposure of abnormal dispositions shrewdly concealed even from those who had opportunities of knowing him.
Ubaldus, Saint, confessor (c. 1100-88), Bp. of Gubbio, b. Gubbio, Italy; d. there. He entered the Monastery of St. Secondo and remained there for a number of years. He was made prior of the cathedral monastery at Gubbio, where he introduced the rule of Blessed Peter de Honestis of Vienna. He was elected Bp. of Gubbio in 1128. Numerous miracles were wrought in his life and after death; canonized 1192. Feast, R. Cal., 16 May.—C.E.; Butler.

Uganda, Vicariate Apostolic of, Africa (British possession), comprises the greater part of Uganda Protectorate; entrusted to the White Fathers; established in 1894 by division from the former Vicariate of Victoria Nyamza, and called until 1915 Vicariate of Victoria Nyamza Northern; illustrious because of the 22 blacks martyred for the faith and beatified in 1920. Vicar Apostolic: Henri Streicher (1897); residence at Roubaga. Churches, 31; parishes, 58; chapels, 1,005; priests, 118; religious men, 125; religious women, 126; schools, 829; pupils, 21,770; institutions, 55; Catholics, 189,204.

Ukrainian Greek Catholic Diocese, see at Philadelphia, Pa.; established 1913; has jurisdiction over all Catholic Uniates of the Ruthenian Rite in the United States, wherever domiciled, and is thus not a territorial diocese; immediately subject to the Holy See. Bishops: Stephen Soter Ortyinsky (1907-16); Constantine Bohachevsky (1924). Churches, 129; priests, secular, 84; priests, regular, 2; religious women, 109; parochial schools, 137; pupils in parochial schools, 12,585; institutions, 3; Ukrainian Catholics, 244,118.

Ukraine, Vicariate Apostolic of, see at Winnipeg, Manitoba; has jurisdiction over all Catholic Uniates of the Ruthenian Rite in Canada, wherever domiciled, and is thus not a territorial diocese. Bishop: Nicetas Budka (1912). Churches and missions, 245; priests, secular, 30; priests, regular, 21; religious women, 81; parochial schools, 10; institutions, 3; Ukrainian Catholics, 290,000.

Ulfilas (ULPHILAS; c. 311-c. 380), apostle of the Goths, d. Constantinople. Educated in Constantinople and consecrated bishop by Eusebius, he worked as a missionary in Dacia and Mesia. He invented a Gothic alphabet and translated all the books of the Bible except the Books of the Kings, which he considered too martial for his already illustrious people. He died in 380. Feast, R. Cal., 25 April.—C.E.

Ullathorne, William Bernard (1806-89), Bp. of Birmingham, b. Pocklington, England; d. Oswestry, Warwickshire. A Benedictine monk at Downside, he volunteered for the Australian mission, and worked there for eight years with the powers of vicar Apostolic. Returning to England he became Bp. of Hertford and vicar Apostolic of the Western District and later of the Central District. He negotiated the restoration of the English hierarchy with success, was made a cardinal in 1879, and was installed as Abp. of Cabasa, 1888. He attended the Vatican Council.—C.E.; Butler, Life and Times of Bishop Ullathorne, N. Y., 1926.

Ulloa, Antonio de (1716-95), scientist, b. Seville, Spain; d. near Cadiz. For two years he was governor of Louisiana (1790-92), and later lieutenant-general of the West Indies. Returning to Spain he had accompanied a scientific expedition sent by the French Academy to Peru, and, after ten years there, published with Jorge Juan a geographical account of South America, its people, and natural history, as well as another work on the early religious orders. To him is due the first museum of natural history and the first metallurgical laboratory in Spain, and the observatory of Cadiz.—C.E.

Ultan of Ardrabacan, Saint, confessor (d. 657), Abbot-Bp. of Ardrabacan. He was the maternal uncle and biographer of St. Brigid. He also wrote a life of St. Patrick and an exquisite hymn to St. Brigid, and was an accomplished illuminator of books. St. Ultan's Well is still in existence at Ardrabacan. Feast, 4 Sept.—C.E.; Butler.

Ultramontane (Lat., ultra, beyond; montes, mountains; beyond the Alps, viz., Italy, and particularly Rome as the home of the pope), name given to Catholics who agreed with the pope on matters of doctrine, discipline, and policy. It came into vogue after the Vatican Council. Cisalpine (this side of the Alps) was the name adopted by those who differed.—C.E.; V, 125. (ed.)

Unbelief means a lack of faith, a refusal to accept the teachings of revealed religion. (T. A. A.)

Unclean, a term which implies the presence of impure elements. According to biblical usage, this condition is contracted, in the main, through contact with such defiling substances as corpses, sexual effluvia, and leprosy. The physical state can be conceived as symbolic of a moral condition (Lev., 11) which, in turn, is in marked contrast to the dignity of the Chosen People in relation with the holiness of God (Lev., 11).—(J. A. N.)

Uniat Churches, Uniates are Eastern Christians who hold the same doctrine as the Western Church (i.e., Catholics of Western Europe, America, and countries depending on them), but have very difdifferent rites and discipline. Their liturgies follow one or other of the great Eastern rites (those of Antioch, Alexandria, Byzantium, or their derivatives), and they usually have a married clergy. All the main groups of Non-Uniat churches have corresponding groups of Uniatists, i.e., those of their former members who have in the course of centuries (particularly in the 16th and 17th) acknowledged their allegiance to the Pope; their names are different in some cases, but the reference letters, A, B, C, etc., in the following list show the connection with the Non-Uniat Churches (q.v.):

A. Byzantine Uniatists, so called because they all use the Rite of Constantinople (Byzantium), are subdivided into 6 groups:
1. Greeks (in Constantinople, Athens, etc.);
2. Melchites (q.v.; in Syria and Egypt);
3. Georgians (Constantinople);
4. Russians;
5. Indo-Greeks (q.v.; in Southern Italy; never schismatic);
6. Ruthenians (q.v.; in Western Russia, Hungary; many in the United States).

B. Chaldeans (Iraq).
C. Syrians.
D. Abyssinians.
E. Catholic Syrians.
F. Uniat Church of Malabar (India).
G. Uniat Armenians.
H. Uniat Bulgarians.

To these must be added:

J. Maronites (q.v.; in Syria; apparently they never were schismatics).

Unicorn, a legendary animal mentioned in the Bible (Is., 34; Ps., 22); sometimes translated by rhinoceros or aurochs (wild ox). The latter corresponds to the re'em of the Hebrews, a two-horned animal, untamed and unfit for domestic use.

Uniformity Acts. These statutes, passed at different times, were vain efforts to secure uniformity in public worship throughout England. The first stated that after Pentecost, 1549, all ministers would be bound to follow the same uniform rite in all public services, but did not enforce attendance at the same. The second, passed in 1549, suppressed and forbade all books and writings in Latin or English, used for church services, other than such as were appointed by the king. The third, passed in 1552, was the first Act of Uniformity to be called by name, and enforced church attendance on Sundays and holy days. No new Act appeared until the one passed when Protestantism returned under Elizabeth: the "Act for the Uniformity of Common Prayer, and Service in the Church, and Administration of the Sacraments"; this Act proved a weapon against the Catholics, who could not conscientiously obey it, and it was used to harass and impoverish them. Relief from the Acts of Uniformity was granted to them by the second Catholic Relief Act, though its benefits were limited to those who made the declaration and took the oath under the Act. For Catholics, the provisions of the Uniformity Acts have been gradually repealed and now apply only to the Established Church of England.

Unigenitus (Lat., unus, one; genus, begotten), the first word of the text of a famous papal Constitution issued by Pope Clement XI, 8 Sept., 1713, condemning the Jansenist doctrines of Quesnel. Besides its importance in determining that certain doctrines are heretical, this Constitution was a central incident in the struggle between the Church and the French kings over the "Gallican Liberties," that is, the claim that the French hierarchy was not subject to the Pope. —C.E. (E. F. M. A.)

Union, Mystical, consists in the experimental love of God, so intimate that the soul, without losing anything of its physical and natural being, is divested of its own affection and is wholly lost in God. This union is communicated not in an ordinary way, but in a peculiar way, and is extraordinary. The holy soul does not perceive itself, but only God. God is present by His power, and this is realized by sanctifying grace which supposes knowledge and love. St. John of the Cross makes this union consist in perfect acts of faith, hope, and love.

(M. J. W.)

Union of Churches (wrongly termed Union of Christendom), name for various movements which have been started from the time of the Reformers in the 16th century to bring about union among the various sects, or divisions, of Christians. Union of Christendom would mean the reunion of the nations once grouped together under this term and this would seem impossible. Even union among Churches is impossible except on the condition that those which claim freedom to determine their own belief, discipline, and mode of worship, come to perceive that all this is not a matter of choice but something that has been determined only by the Founder of the Church of God. With Protestant Churches the tendency heretofore has been to divide and start new groups. Of late there is a reaction which has led to many movements for reunion among Churches, among Methodists, for instance, and Presbyterians, which in the United States had broken up into sectional bodies. The Catholic Church encourages attempts to unite all Christians in one body according to the prayer of Christ at the Last Supper and His prophecy as the Good Shepherd (John, 10). Those who have had experience in counseling advocates of such union well know that it is vain to attempt union of Churches as such. Individual Christians, or small groups, very often with success seek and find the "one fold and one Shepherd," but if there are great difficulties in the way of bringing any Church into union with another, no matter how much the two may seem to agree, the difficulty of leading the members of any non-Catholic body into the Catholic Church would seem insurmountable. Still, as the light of God is a grace, and this can be obtained by prayer, the Church has appointed various Sundays and week days also of prayer for this great object: "That they may be all one, as thou, Father, in me, and I in thee" (John, 17).—C.E., XV, 132; Maturin, The Price of Unity, Lond., 1912.

Union of South Africa, self-governing dominion of the British Empire, comprising the provinces of the Cape of Good Hope, Natal, the Transvaal, and the Orange Free State; area, 472,347 sq. m.; pop., 7,234,753. Catholicity was introduced into South Africa in 1660, when a French bishop and a few priests were saved from shipwreck off the Cape of Good Hope. In 1688 the first Mass was said in Cape Colony. Frs. Joannes Lansink, Jacobus Melissen, and Lambertus Prinsen arrived at Cape Town in 1803, but they were banished the following year. The first missionary who ministered to the Catholics of Natal was Fr. Murphy. Until 1852 there was no resident priest there, and at the advent of Fr. Allard and his five companions, in that year, the Catholic population comprised only a few whites. Fr. Allard founded the mission of St. Michael, exclusively for the natives. The work of evangelization was very slow, yet the missionaries worked with indefatigable zeal and they were soon able to organize stations as far as Basutoland. More missions, chapels, and schools were founded by Fr. Jolivet; the Dominicans, Sisters and the Marist Brothers were brought to the Cape of Good Hope by Fr. Grimley, and Trappists came to South Africa in 1886, later forming the "Congregation of the Missionaries of Mariannhill." From 1874 to 1882 the Central Prefecture of Good Hope was entrusted to the Missionary Fathers of Lyons, and on their withdrawal it was committed to the Oblates of St. Francis de Sales. Prior to 1877, when a mission was established in Pretoria, the Catholics of Transvaal were visited by a priest from Natal. During the past 50 years missionary work has been carried on among the natives on a large scale and the number of converts has increased annually.

The Union of South Africa in 1929 included the following ecclesiastical divisions: Vicariates Apostolic: Basutoland, Cape of Good Hope (Eastern), Cape of Good Hope (Western), Eshowe, Kimberley, Mariannhill, Natal, Orange River, Transvaal, Windhoek, Prefectures Apostolic: Cape of Good Hope (Central), Gariep, Great Namaqualand, Kroonstad, Lydenburg, Moutse, Swaziland, Transvaal (Southern). According to latest available statistics there are 346 churches, 114 secular priests, 312 regular priests, 12 universities and colleges, 3 seminaries, 45 high schools, 586 primary schools, 205 charitable institutions, and a Catholic population of 460,132.

Unions of Prayer. A tendency among the faithful to form unions of prayer has been manifested in the establishment of organizations like the following: (1) The Association of Prayer and Penance in Honor of the Heart of Jesus, founded at Dijon in 1879, made an archconfraternity by Leo XIII, 1894. Its purpose is to offer reparation for sin and for outrages against the Church and the pope, to obtain the welfare of the former, the freedom of the latter, and the salvation of the world. (2) The Archconfraternity of Our Lady of Compassion for the Return of England to the Catholic Faith, founded at Saint-Sulpice, Paris, by a Brief of Leo XIII, 1897. (3) The Pious Unioin of Prayer to Our Lady of Compassion for the Conversion of Heretics, founded at Rome, 1890. (4) Archconfraternity of Prayers and Good Works for the Reunion of Eastern Schismatics with the Church, founded at Constantinople, and made an archconfraternity by Leo XIII in 1898.—C.E.

Union That Nothing Be Lost, the missionary agency of the Society of the Atonement (q.v.), which developed after the reception of the latter into the Catholic Church. Practically every part of the mission field has benefited by its minis-
United Society of Believers (commonly called Shakers), a development of a religious movement which originated in the middle of the 18th century in England, and organized in New York near Niskayuna or Watervliet, 1776. Jane Wardley was the English leader, and her associate, Ann Lee, founded them in America. She urged her neighbors to practice right living; so strongly was their emotion at their meetings that their bodies were agitated and as a result they were called "Shaking Quakers." Shakerism is said to be "a kind of Christian socialism, whose basis is the spiritual family, founded on the type of the natural family." The most important tenets of Shakerism are "virgin purity, peace or non-resistance, brotherhood, and community of goods." The Shakers are noted for their inspirational singing. In the United States, in 1825, there were 6 churches, and 250 members.

United States, republic in North America, whose government is based on a Constitution and entrusted to executive, legislative, and judicial authorities; area, 9,372,610 sq. m.; pop., 76,293,416. Catholicism in the United States dates from the landing of the first explorers, and the history of the Catholic Church lies in three distinct channels, emanating from England, France, and Spain, the three European nations which in the early period claimed the different sections of the country. Spanish missionaries were the first to preach the Gospel in the United States. Beginning with the discovery of Florida in 1512, secular priests and missionaries accompanied practically every Spanish expedition, and played an important part in every Spanish settlement. Missions were established in Florida by the Dominicans, but owing to constant persecution by the Indians they were forced to seek the aid of the Jesuits and later the Franciscans. California was evangelized by the Franciscans during the Spanish occupation. In the 17th century the evangelization of the country around the Great Lakes and the entire Mississippi Valley was accomplished by the Jesuits, with the assistance of Recollects, and Priests of the Foreign Missions. The English Catholic colony of Maryland, founded in 1634, was first served by the Jesuits, who ministered to the settlers and converted the natives. With the exception of Maryland, the original thirteen colonies engaged in the persecution of Catholics and the early settlers underwent the same struggles which beset England at this time. After the Revolutionary War and the establishment of the federal government, religious toleration was extended, and one of the first amendments to the Constitution declares that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." Since that time the Church and State have been free and independent bodies, and there has never been any display of hostility between the two. Catholics are on an equal footing with the members of all other churches, and they enjoy equal rights and privileges with their fellow-citizens.

The United States in 1829 included the following ecclesiastical divisions: Archdioceses: Baltimore, Boston, Chicago, Cincinnati, Dubuque, Milwaukee, New Orleans, New York, Philadelphia, Portland in Oregon, St. Louis, St. Paul, San Antonio, San Francisco, Santa Fé. Dioceses: Albany, Alexandria, Altoona, Amarillo, Baker City, Belleville, Bismarck, Boise, Brooklyn, Buffalo, Burlington, Charleston, Cheyenne, Cleveland, Columbus, Concordia, Corpus Christi, Covington, Crookston, Dallas, Denver, Des Moines, Detroit, El Paso, Erie, Fall River, Fargo, Fort Wayne, Galveston, Grand Island, Grand Rapids, Great Falls, Green Bay, Harrisburg, Hartford, Helena, Indianapolis, Kansas City, La Crosse, Lafayette, Lead, Leavenworth, Lincoln, Little Rock, Los Angeles and San Diego, Louisville, Manchester, Marquette, Mobile, Monroe, Memphis, Minneapolis, Omaha, Peoria, Pittsburgh, Portland, Providence, Raleigh, Richmond, Rochester, Rockford, Sacramento, St. Augustine, St. Cloud, St. Joseph, Salt Lake, Savannah, Scranton, Seattle, Sioux City, Sioux Falls, Spokane, Springfield (III.), Springfield (Mass.), Superior, Syracuse, Toledo, Trenton, Tucson, Wheeling, Wichita, Wilmington, Winona, St. Louis, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Columbus, Pittsburgh (Greek Rite), Vicariates Apostolic: Alaska, Hawaii. States: 17,936 churches; 18,722 secular priests; 763 regular seminaries; 237 universities and colleges; 138 seminaries; 703 high schools; 703 primary schools; 1131 charitable Institutions; 20,112,758 Catholics.
Fact of consent, but also the principle by which that Church. Hence, unity of faith not only involves the belief of all in the same truths; and the admission of all to one common principle which determines this belief, viz., the magisterium of the Church. Hence, unity of faith not only involves the fact of consent, but also the principle by which that fact is perpetually produced and preserved. Social unity is constituted in the unity of legitimate sub-ordination under the same ruling power, or in the mutual agreement of all with common interests under the direction of one ruling power. In this way, one body or one society is constituted. Ritual unity consists in common participation in all those sacred rites which are of divine institution. The Church, as a religious society intended to offer God a true cult, ought to unite in those sacred rites by which men are dedicated to God, by which they offer Him worship, and are, in turn, perfected by Him. However, since the Church is one religious society, it is necessary that these rites be common to all belonging to that society. Ritual unity is both material and formal. Material ritual unity is the communication itself of all the members of the Church in these rites. Formal ritual unity is the principle in the Church determining this communication, as well as its stability and perpetuity. This principle is the ministry of the Church, instituted by Christ, to guard and administer the sacred rites.

The Catholic Church, according to the analysis given above, is one. It has unity of faith, because all the faithful, believing what the Church teaches, believe, at least implicitly, all the truths handed down by the Apostles, and only those truths; they accept the same creed, interpreted in the same way by the one magisterium of the Church. It enjoys social unity, because the faithful and the clergy are subject to one head, the pope, who by his supreme authority, is the center of unity in the vast society which makes up the Church. It has ritual unity, because all in the Church have the same Sacrifice, the same Sacraments, administered by Christ, to guard and administer the sacred rites. Ritual unity is both material and formal. Material ritual unity is the communication itself of all the members of the Church in these rites. Formal ritual unity is the principle in the Church determining this communication, as well as its stability and perpetuity. This principle is the ministry of the Church, instituted by Christ, to guard and administer the sacred rites.

Catholic Unity is established in general on this point, that there are not many churches of Christ, but one only. This general concept, however, may very well lead to confusion, because no one denies it. In order that the Church may be said to be one and unique, there is required the union of all those who belong to it, a union of such a nature that it really constitutes one religious society of the faithful. Hence we say that this unity consists in common participation in all those sacred rites which are of divine institution. The Church, as a religious society intended to offer God a true cult, ought to unite in those sacred rites by which men are dedicated to God, by which they offer Him worship, and are, in turn, perfected by Him. Pace, Condé B. Pallen, Bishop Thomas J. Shahin, James J. Walsh, John J. Wyne; in twelve volumes; vols. I and II already published, by the Universal Knowledge Foundation, New York. (Ed.)

Universe, The, a Catholic weekly newspaper published in London, England, which owes its inception to Cardinal Wiseman, who, inspired by the work of "L'Univers" in Paris, suggested the foundation of a popular English paper to counteract the anti-Catholic propaganda carried on extensively at that time by the British press. First issued 8 Dec., 1860, under the editorship of Archibald Dunn, it was later controlled by Denis Lane. Politically a non-party paper, while maintaining its popular character "The Universe" does not fail to deal frankly with political issues when Catholic principles are involved; a special feature is its worldwide news service; now owned by a private limited liability company. Universities. At various times in the 11th century civil and ecclesiastical authorities of Christian Europe decreed that each church and monastery maintain a school; institutions of higher learning which rose to importance in the 13th century were a natural development of these. University then meant the aggregate body ("universitas") who taught or studied there, rather than the buildings or equipment, which for centuries were non-existent. Paris, famed for its theology, and Bologna, renowned for law, were the most celebrated universities of the Middle Ages, and served as models for others, in the north and south, respectively. Though civil rulers guaranteed the universities protection and privileges, the ruler whose favors and charters were most valued was the pope, who, because of the Church's universality, could guarantee the cherished right to teach everywhere; civil charters often localized this privilege. The four faculties were usually the fine arts, theology, law, and medicine. All teaching was done in Latin, as the principal aim was training for the Church. The chancellor, representing the papacy and conferring degrees, the rector, dean of the arts' faculty and real head of the university, the deans of the respective faculties, and the proctors, representing the interests of the "Nations" into which the cosmopolitan body of students was divided, administered the university. Previous to the Reformation, 81 universities were established; 13 had no charter, developing ex consuetudine (by custom); 33 had papal charters; 15 were of royal or imperial foundation; and 20 founded by both papal and imperial authority. The essential reason for papal authorization was, as St. Thomas said, "In the matter of universities, authority belongs to the chief ruler of the commonwealth, and especially to the Apostolic See, the head of the Universal Church, whose interest is furthered by the university." There is no ground for the inference that foundation of universities by civil powers was a symptom of antagonism to Rome; the spirit and cause of medieval universities could not have existed but for the unity of faith and jurisdiction which held the West together; Russia and countries of the schismatic Orthodox church contributed nothing to the university movement. The effect of the Renaissance in universities was not revolt, as the popes were its patrons, but the Reformation, changing their very essence, localized the old international universities and narrowed the new ones to the creed of their founder. Famous universities of northern Europe, e.g., Oxford, Cambridge, Aberdeen, Heidelberg, were all "reformed"; many universities, notably Louvain, of the more southerly countries, some of them later taken by the state, resisted Protestantism. But the Church did not lose interest in her old, nor cease to establish new universities. For the establishment of a Catholic university now, the pope's authorization alone is necessary, if the foundation is made with ecclesiastical or private funds; if public funds are also used, authorization from the civil power must likewise be obtained, and the state's right to establish purely secular faculties is recognized.—C.E.; Graves, History of Education, N. Y., 1910; Marquis, History of Christian Education, N.Y., 1924.

Universities Catholic Education Board, The maintains at Oxford and at Cambridge a University Catholic Chaplain for the exclusive benefit of Catholic undergraduates; his duty is to minister to the spiritual needs of such students and to provide conferences on historical, religious, and philosophical topics, in accordance with the conditions on which alone the Holy See was willing, in 1895, to conternance the presence of Catholics at these universities. University Catholic Societies' Federation. Since numbers of Catholic young men and women attend universities in Great Britain, a Catholic Society has been formed within each university to help the students to preserve their faith, to develop their knowledge of it, and to assist in forming an educated Catholic opinion. The need for contact between these societies led to the formation of a central body, University Catholic Societies' Federation. This Federation holds occasional regional or other meetings as well as an annual general meeting; it is also attached to the "Invidia," international secretariat, which links together similar groups in other countries of Europe and elsewhere. The U.C.S.F. issues a periodical entitled "The University Catholics' Review." (E. v.

The faculties include art, philosophy, Celtic studies, science, law, medicine, engineering and architecture, and commerce.—C.E., XV, 200.

Unjust Judge, principal character in a parable recounted only in Luke, 18. It tells the story of an iniquitous judge who feared nothing in heaven nor on earth. For a long time he refused to hear the just cause of a destitute widow, but at last, worn out by her unwavering perseverance, he consented. The force of Christ's teaching here is that if this judge, although wicked and harsh and criminally careless of duty, nevertheless finally surrenders to the unceasing petitions of the poor widow, surely God, who is goodness and justice itself, will hear the persevering prayers of His elect. The parable belongs to that series spoken towards the end of Christ's mortal life, possibly in Perea, though the precise time and place are not certainly known. The immediate listeners were the disciples of The Lord. They had previously heard of the temptations and trials which would usher in the last days, and the Lord wished to caution them that they should not grow weary, but he ever instant in prayer: "that we ought always to pray and not to faint." The parable shows plainly the dignity, the necessity, and the power of prayer, and that perseverance is one of the necessary conditions of prayer.—Cal­lan, The Four Gospels, N. Y., 1917; Fonek, tr. Leahy, Parables of the Gospel, N. Y., 1915.

Unjust Steward, title of a parable related only in Luke, 16. The Evangelist tells very little about the circumstances surrounding this similitude. From the text it appears that besides the Apostles and disciples there were Pharisees, publicans, and sin­ners among the audience. It was probably given during the last term of Christ's public life. In this parable Our Lord tells the story of a wealthy man whose steward, a high official, has been called to account because of his dishonesty, and given notice of dismissal. The embarrassment of the steward is shown in a typical Lucan monologue, wherein the servant, soliloquizing, states his unfitness to dig and his shame at the thought of begging. He then con­ceives a shrewd though dishonest plan of action which will provide for his future, when he shall be deprived of both means and his stewardship. Pending the time of his actual removal he calls the various debtors of his employer and greatly re­duces their bills of indebtedness, thus securing their friendship and help for the future. This trans­action comes to the knowledge of the rich master, who while presiding with the punishment and the removal, passes a favorable comment on the clever astuteness of the cunning knave who so prudently looked to his own interests. The parable closes with this commendation: Jesus observes that the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light, and He adds—"make unto you disciples of this world, and they will teach you wisdom." The immediate listeners were the disciples of the Lord, who, having witnessed this heartless conduC't, report it to the king, and just retribution and punishment im­mediately follow. The servant was delivered to the king, owing the enormous sum of 10,000 talents ($10,000,000). As he is un­able to pay the debt, orders are given that he and his wife, and his children, and all that he possesses, be sold and the proceeds be put into the state treasury. The servant falls on his knees and pitifully begs for mercy. "Have patience with me, and I will pay thee all." The king is moved with pity, and with royal generosity not only sets him free but makes him a present of the whole debt. The second scene depicts the pardoned official leaving the presence of the royal master and encountering a fellow servant who owed him the small sum of 100 pence (about $1.50). He seizes this fellow servant, throttles him, and demands the payment of the debt. The fellow servant falls on his knees and begs for mercy: "Have patience with me, and I will pay thee all." The official pitilessly refuses and has the debtor cast into prison until he should pay the whole debt. In the last scene, other servants having witnessed this heartless conduct, report it to the king, and just retribution and punishment im­mediately follow. The servant was delivered to the torturers until he should have paid the whole debt. Jesus Himself gives the lesson the parable is to illustrate: "So shall my heavenly Father do to you, if you forgive not every one his brother from your hearts." The chief idea of the parable is clear and easily understood. Mercy and forgiveness must be extended one to another in order to obtain mercy and forgiveness from God. The application is obvious: the king is God; the ten thousand talents, man's sins against God; the hundred pence, man's offenses against his fellow men; the merciless servant, the unforgiving man; punishment of the wicked servant, the spiritual punishment awaiting the unmerciful man. The king's revoking the former pardon by no means signifies the revival of former sins. Sin once remitted never returns. The unmerciful servant is not punished for his old debt, but for his new and greater sin of heartlessness to his fellow servant. No particulars are given as to the time and place of this instruction. It was spoken before the last journey to Jerusalem, perhaps while Christ was still in Galilee. The parable is appointed to be read on the Twenty-first Sunday after Pentecost.—Madame Cecilia, St. Matthew, Lond., 1906; Fonek, tr. Leahy, The Parables of the Gospel, N. Y., 1913; Ollivier, tr. Leahy, The Parables of Our Lord, Lond., 1927.

Upper Egypt. Mission, extends from Cairo to Assouan; subject to the Vicariate Apostolic of Egypt; entrusted to the Friars Minor, by whom it was founded in 1687. Superior: Marien Libri, F.M. Forefather: A fellow servant. No particulars are given as to the time and place of this instruction. It was spoken before the last journey to Jerusalem, perhaps while Christ was still in Galilee. The parable is appointed to be read on the Twenty-first Sunday after Pentecost.—Madame Cecilia, St. Matthew, Lond., 1906; Fonek, tr. Leahy, The Parables of the Gospel, N. Y., 1913; Ollivier, tr. Upper Nile, Vicariate Apostolic of, Uganda Protectorate, Africa (British possession). Comprises the eastern portion of Uganda, on the Nile; entrusted to the Foreign Missionaries of Mill Hill; established 1894. Vicar Apostolic: John Campling (1925); residence at Kampala or Mengo, Nysamba. Churches, 25; oratories, 8; chapels, 765; priests, 63; pupils in primary schools, 37,501; Catholics, 45,738.

Uppsala. City in northeastern Sweden. Before the introduction of Christianity by St. Ansgar (829), Upsala was famous in Scandinavia for its heathen temple. In 1164 Upsala was established as an archdiocese, the see being transferred to Aros in 1274. During the Middle Ages it became a kind of ecclesiastical capital and numerous religious orders co-operated in training the people. The Reformation entirely wiped out Catholicism in Upsala, and in all Sweden, which is today a vicariate apostolic. The Gothic cathedral, begun in 1287, the largest church in Scandinavia, and the celebrated university, founded in 1477 through the efforts of Archbishop Ulfsson, are now Protestant. Eric, the national saint, St. Bridget (d. 1373), foundress of the Bridgettines, and her daughter, St. Catherine, are among the glories of Upsala.

Uppsala, University of, founded by a Bull of Pope Sixtus IV, 1477, at the request of Abp. Jacob Ulfsson, primate of the Swedish church (1470-1515). It was modeled on the University of Bologna, had the same privileges and liberties, and faculties of theology, canon and civil law, medicine, and philosophy. The Abp. of Upsala was appointed chancellor and empowered to grant the degrees of bachelor, licentiate, doctor, and master. Religious schism appeared during the rectorate of Laurentius Petri, who had studied under Luther, and who, as the first Protestant Abp. of Upsala, introduced the Reformation in Sweden. The university was closed, 1560, but its place was taken for Catholics by the collegium regium at Stockholm, for a while under Jesuit control. It was reopened as a government institution by order of the General Council of Sweden, 1593. At present it numbers 2806 students.—C.E.

Urban I (Lat., urbius, of the city), Pope (222-230), b. Rome; d. there. Little is known of his pontificate beyond the fact that he continued the papal opposition to Hippolytus of Rome and the schismatic party.—C.E.

Urban II (Ono of Lagery), Blessed, Pope (1088-99), b. Châtillon-sur-Marne, France, c. 1042; d. Rome. He was a Benedictine, Archdeacon of Reims, Chap. Bp. of Troyes, John of Brienne, and legate to Germany, 1132-35. The beginning of his pontificate saw the antipope Guibert and his adherent Henry IV in power at Rome, and Urban was forced to wander through the southern Italy until 1194. As pope he excommunicated Henry IV and his antipope Guibert, and Philip I of France, who had been unfaithful to his wife; summoned the Council of Bari, 1098, to attempt a reconciliation with the Greeks on the Filiqoue question. As a result of a plea from the Eastern emperor, Alexius I, he summoned the Council of Clermont (1095), which made plans for a Crusade to capture Jerusalem. The city was won for Christendom but Urban died before the news reached him. Feast, 30 July.—C.E.; Mann.

Urban III (Guillaume de Grimoard), Blessed, Pope (1185-87), b. Milan, Italy; d. Ferrara. He was a cardinal and Abp. of Milan before his election at Verona. Early in 1187 he dispatched two legates to England to crown Prince John as King of Ireland. He refused to crown Frederick's son Henry, emperor, and was about to excommunicate Barbarossa when he died.—C.E.; Mann.

Urban IV (Jacques Pantaléon), Pope (1261-64), b. Troyes, France; d. Perugia, Italy. The son of a French cobbler, he became nuncio to Silesia, Poland, Russia, and Pomerania; Bp. of Ver­­dun, 1253; Patriarch of Jerusalem, 1255. After his election at Viterbo he reestablished papal sovereignty in Rome by placing the papal finances on a firm basis and by his diplomatic policy in utilizing the rivalries of unfriendly states. His appointment of Frenchmen to the cardinalate led to the control of the Sacred College by that country in the 14th century. The feast of Corpus Christi was instituted by him, 1246.—C.E.

Urban V (Guillaume de Grimoard), Blessed, Pope (1362-70), b. Grasse, France, 1310; d. Avignon. A noted Benedectine canonist, he was legate to Milan, and to Naples before his election. Although an abbot only, he was elected by the Sacred College when they were unable to choose one of their own number. The most important acts of his pontificate were: (1) the return to Rome, 1367, where he restored the papal buildings and reconciled the Eastern Emperor John V Palaeologus to the Church; (2) the alliance between the emperor Charles IV and the Church. He excommunicated the condottieri and the tyrant Bernabò Visconti; founded the Universities of Cracow, 1364, and Vienna, 1365; gave aid to the Universities of Orange, Orléans, Avignon, and Toulouse. French opposition and political conflicts forced him to return to Avignon, 1370.—C.E.; Pastor.

URBAN VI (BARTOLOMEO PRIGNANI), POPE (1378-89), b. Naples, Italy; d. Rome. He was Abp. of Acerra, and of Bari, manager of the papal chancery, and first Roman pope during the Western Schism. His lack of tact later led his electors to declare falsely that they had chosen him under intimidation, and to elect the antipope Robert of Geneva, thus opening the Western Schism. A canonist of note and an able financial manager, he improved the business affairs of the papacy, but his severity led him to depose Queen Joanna of Naples and to estrange most of his cardinals. The result was, that although his election was valid, Christendom was divided by the conflict into two obediences of almost equal strength.—C.E.; Pastor.

URBAN VII (GIAMBATTEA CASTAGNO), POPE (1590), b. Rome, 1521; d. there. Noted as a canonist, he was prior to his election, Abp. of Rossano; governor of Perugia and Umbria; attendant at the Council of Trent, 1562-63; nuncio to Spain; governor of Bologna; legate to Cologne; Consultor of the Holy Office and the Ecclesiastical State; cardinal-priest; and Inquisitor-General of the Holy Office. He accomplished no important acts during his short pontificate.—C.E.

URBAN VIII (MAFFEO BARBERINI), POPE (1623-44), b. Florence, Italy, 1568; d. Rome. Educated at the Roman College, he was governor of Fano, legate to France, Abp. of Nazareth, nuncio to Paris, cardinal-priest, and legate to Bologna, prior to his election. He opened his reign, which embraced the period of the Thirty Years’ War, by issuing Bulls of canonization of Philip Nerli, Ignatius Loyola, and Francis Xavier. A patron of the foreign missions, he aided them with subsidies, extended the sphere of activity of the College of Propaganda, founded the Urban College, 1627, and opened China and Japan to all missionaries, 1633. He had little success in aiding Catholicism in England; issued a Bull against slavery, 1639; built the Barberini Palace and Library; founded the Vatican Seminary; and erected the baldachinum over the high altar in St. Peter’s.—C.E.; Mann.

Urban College, Rome, for the evangelization of the East, founded, 1627, by P. Ghislieri, Theatine, and G. Battia Vives, with the approval of Urban VIII, is dependent on the Sacred Congregation of the Propaganda. In 1798 the college was closed, but reopened 1817; it has courses of classics, philosophy, and theology.

URBI ET ORBI (Lat., for the city and for the world), blessing given by the pope, after his election, from the balcony of Saint Peter’s to the visible multitude before him and invisible multitudes throughout the world; a like blessing given several times a year. Also, decrees binding the rest of the world as well as Rome, 1, and consecrated by the English title given is by J. Neale.—Britt.

URIM and THUMMIM, two mysterious objects, mentioned in 1 K. Ex., 28. From every indication it is evident that they were lots and were used to obtain information from God; but the material, shape, size, color, and manner of using are unknown. They were carried in the pectoral of the High Priest, and their use seems to have been reserved to him. After the Babylonian Captivity they were no longer in use, as is evident from 1 Esd., 2, and 2 Esd., 7. The Vulgate translates the words, “Doctrine and Truth,” the Syriac, “Light and Perfection”; but the oldest references to them suggest that the words expressed two sharply contrasted ideas, like light and darkness, yes and no, and life and death.—C.E. (m. s.)

URSICINUS, or URBINUS (Lat., urinus, belonging to a bear), antipope (366-367). He was elected in opposition to Damasus I, and consecrated by the Bp. of Tivoli, contrary to the Church ordinance which demands three bishops for the papal consecration, and custom, which includes in this number the Bp. of Ostia who performs the consecration act. He had been a deacon and Abbot of Ligugé but sympathized with the Luciferians and the Arians. Emperor Valentinian I banished him, 1 Kings, 14, it is evident that they were lots and were used to obtain information from God; but the material, shape, size, color, and manner of using are unknown. They were carried in the pectoral of the High Priest, and their use seems to have been reserved to him. After the Babylonian Captivity they were no longer in use, as is evident from 1 Esd., 2, and 2 Esd., 7. The Vulgate translates the words, “Doctrine and Truth,” the Syriac, “Light and Perfection”; but the oldest references to them suggest that the words expressed two sharply contrasted ideas, like light and darkness, yes and no, and life and death.—C.E. (m. s.)

URSULA AND COMPANIONS, SAINTS, virgins, martyrs (Cologne, 383). According to the legend preserved and recorded in the Vatican Library, St. Ursula was the daughter of a Christian king of Great Britain. Being sought in marriage by a great pagan king, she obtained a delay of three years; this time was spent in traveling; eleven ships having been supplied by Ursula’s betrothed to accommodate her and 10 companions, each attended by 1000 virgins. They were driven by storm up the Rhine as far as Basle, whence they journeyed on foot to Rome, and visited the holy places; returning to Cologne, they were killed by the Huns in hatred of the faith. Various conflicting legends have arisen concerning the time, place, and manner of their martyrdom. Emblems: a ship, a cloak, and an arrow. Relics at Cologne. Feast, R. Cal., 20 Oct.—C.E.; Butler.
URSULINES

Ursulines, a religious order of women founded by St. Angela Merici in 1535 at Brescia, Italy, for the education of girls. The Rule of St. Augustine was adopted in 1544 when the first approbation was received from Pope Paul III. As many important details remained unsettled at this time, several congregations differing widely in customs, but all calling themselves Ursulines, were formed. Final approbation was received from Paul V, 1618. Among the important congregations were those of Paris (developed from the first foundations), introduced into Ireland, 1771, by Nano Nagle, foundress of the Order of the Presentation; of Bordeaux, 1606; of Lyons, 1610; of Dijon, 1619; of Quebec, 1639. The first establishment in the United States was made at New Orleans, 1727.—C.E.

Ursulines of Quebec, a branch of the Ursuline Order, founded at Quebec, 1639, by Madeleine de Chauvigny de la Peltrie, and Marie Guyart de l’Incarnation, for the education of youth. The Quebec monastery, which is the oldest institution of learning for women in North America, established houses at Roberval, Stanstead, Rimouski (the latter founding a convent at Gaspe), and another at Quebec. The sisters conduct boarding and normal schools. The mother-house is at Quebec; the total number of religious is 334. A branch founded at Three Rivers (1697) is now independent and has established other foundations in Canada and the United States. C.E.

Uruguay, republic in South America, administered by a President assisted by a National Administrative Council and a Parliament; area, 72,153 sq. m.; pop., 1,720,408. Catholicity was introduced into Uruguay by Franciscan missionaries who converted the native Chanas. In the 17th century the Jesuits took up the task of evangelizing and civilizing the aboriginal tribes. At their expulsion, in 1767, the Indians lost their teachers and protectors; and, oppressed by the Spaniards, they diminished rapidly, until finally all the native Charruas were slaughtered. With the return of the Jesuits and the arrival of other religious orders, the preaching of the Faith was again undertaken; churches, schools, and hospitals were founded; and according to the Constitution, Catholicity is now the state religion. The church and State however are entirely separate and there is complete religious liberty.

Utah, the 10th state of the United States in size, the 40th in population, and the 45th state to be admitted to the Union (4 Jan., 1896); area, 84,999 sq. m.; pop. (1920), 449,396; Catholics (1928), 12,147. The earliest preaching to the Indians living within the present Utah was done by two Franciscans, Fr. Sílvester de Escaletane and Fr. Atanasio Domínguez, who traveled north from Santa Fé, in 1776, as far as Great Salt Lake. In 1841 Fr. Pierre de Smet, S.J., journeyed through Utah on his way to the Yellowstone, and it is thought that his description of the Salt Lake valley

Ushaw College, England, founded, 1794, at Crook Hall to continue the work of Douai; removed to Ushaw, 1808. Mgr. Newsham who became president, 1837, enlarged and improved the buildings and is regarded as the founder of modern Ushaw. John Lingard, Cardinals Wiseman, Bourne, De la Puente, and Merry del Val were among its alumni.—C.E.

Usuard (d. 875), Benedictine monk of the Abbey of St. Germain-des-Prés, Paris. In 858 he was sent to Spain to procure certain important relics. He is famous chiefly for his "Martyrology," a compilation upon which the existing Roman Martyrology depends very closely, and which is preserved to us in innumerable manuscripts.—C.E.

Usury (Lat., usurca, a use), an exorbitant rate, or the improper use, of interest; specifically, in law, interest in excess of the legal rate. A fair rate of interest nearly corresponds to the average gain that those engaged in business may generally expect in a determined center. Such a rate covers the risks and ordinary inconveniences of lending. Lending money at interest is subject to abuse. The abuse constitutes the sin of usury. In some countries are found instances of the exaction of interest at thirty, fifty, and even higher per cent. Church and state combined in the Middle Ages to check the abuse, without success. Luther for a time strove to prevent it. As a remedy for such evil, associations for mutual lending have been instituted. In practise, interest should be exacted according to the usages established amongst honest men, precisely as prices are set. Particular circumstances influence the just rate of interest by either increasing or lowering it.—C.E.; Slater, A Manual of Moral Theology, Lond., 1898. (M. F.) influenced Brigham Young, whom the missionary met in 1846 near Council Bluffs, to settle there. When Rev. Jean Baptiste Raverdy of Denver visited Salt Lake City, 1863, he found no Catholic settlers but he ministered to the Catholic soldiers at Fort Douglas, as the guest of the commander, Gen. Patrick Edward Connor. The first Mass in Salt Lake City was said in 1866, by Rev. Edward Kelly of Sacramento, in the Assembly Hall of the Mormons, through the courtesy of Brigham Young. In 1869 the first church, a little adobe chapel easily accommodating the handful of Catholics, was built by Rev. James P. Foley, made rector of Salt Lake by Bp. Machebeuf of Denver. The state forms a part of the Diocese of Salt Lake (q.v.). Catholic influence on place-names of the state is shown in the following: Mount Carmel, St. George, St. John, Santa Clara. The U. S. Religious Census of 1916 gave the following statistics for church membership in Utah:

Utilitarianism (Lat., utilis, useful), an ethical theory making the ultimate norm of morality that which conduces to the greatest happiness by giving pleasure or avoiding pain. According to its greatest exponent, John Stuart Mill (1806-1873), social utility is to be preferred to individual; moral and intellectual to the merely sensual; but with other members of the school, utilitarianism differs little from hedonism (q.v.). Herbert Spencer proposes an evolutionist form of the system, emphasizing fulness and intensity of human life as the basic ethical aim. Utilitarianism is not in accord with Christian principles, since it is fundamentally and logically an egoistic and subjectivistic moral system, based on the assumption that whatever is useful is right. —C.E.; Cronin, Science of Ethics, N. Y., 1920; Readings in Ethics, Chi., 1926. (J. A. B.)

Utopia (Gr., ou, not; topos, place: nowhere), the name given by Bl. Thomas More to the imaginary ideal state described in his book by that name. In general, any imaginary state whose inhabitants are pictured as living under the most perfect possible circumstances. Such ideal commonwealths have been described by Plato, Bacon, Campanella, and others. In an invidious sense, Utopia and Utopian are used for any visionary scheme of social reform, particularly one which fails to recognize the defects inherent in human nature.—C.E. (E. F. Mack.)

Ut queant laxis resonare fibris, or O, FOR THY SPIRIT, HOLY JOHN, TO CHASTEN, hymn for Vespers on 24 June, feast of the Nativity of St. John the Baptist. It was written by Paul the Deacon (720-799). There are about 20 translations. The English title given is found in "The Hyunner," and is a cento based on the translation by W. Blew.—C.E.; Britt.
Roman Emperor (364-375), b. Cibalis, Pannonia, ish foundation with the name Ulid or Walid. When he died. Though a sincere Christian, in sesses a magnificent cathedral (595), the church ruler of the East, fought the Alamani at Chflions, vast territories. Roman Emperor (375-392), b. Gaul; murdered, Vienne, Dauphiné, Gaul. Little more than a nominal ruler, his territory included only Italy where he was overshadowed by his mother, Justina, the real ruler with whom he resided at Xifian. Upon his mother's death, he abandoned Arianism which she had favored. Just, but weak, he fell under the influence of Arbogast who finally caused his assassination. He cooperated with Pope Siricius in the erection of the Basilica of St. Paul.—C.E.

Valentinian II (Flavius Valentinianus), Roman Emperor (383-392), b. Gaul; murdered, Vienne, Dauphiné, Gaul. Little more than a nominal ruler, his territory included only Italy where he was overshadowed by his mother, Justina, the real ruler with whom he resided at Xifian. Upon his mother’s death, he abandoned Arianism which she had favored. Just, but weak, he fell under the influence of Arbogast who finally caused his assassination. He cooperated with Pope Siricius in the erection of the Basilica of St. Paul.—C.E.

Valentine, Pope (887), b. Rome; d. Rome. During his reign, the decay of the Western Empire was hastened by the abandonment of Britain, 446, the failure of Attilus to hold Gaul against the Franks and Huns, and the loss of Africa. In 425 all schismatics were ordered to leave Rome. Valentinian strongly opposed the Manicheans, and ardently supported papal supremacy. At the approach of Attila he fled from Ravenna to Rome, where he was later assassinated. —C.E.

Valerian (Publius Aurelius Licinius Valerianus), Roman emperor (253-260), proclaimed emperor by the army at Rhegium, he proved weak and vacillating and, influenced by Macrinus, originated the persecution of Christians under Decius. He was finally captured by the Persians and spent the rest of his life in torture and humiliation as a prisoner.—C.E.

Valiant Woman, the strong woman of the Scriptures (Prov. 31); among the best analyses of character in the O.T. (EB.)

Vacancy, the condition of an office destitute of an incumbent: (1) the Holy See becomes vacant at the death or resignation of the pope; (2) other ecclesiastical offices and benefices, by resignation, deprivation, removal, transfer, and lapse of time for which conferred; not, however, by the mere fact that the grantor goes out of office, unless otherwise specified in the law (e.g., Vicar General) or in the appointment papers.—C.E.; Ayrinhac.

Vacant See, a diocese in which there is no bishop. It is necessary that the impediment be known to both parties, it is enough that he renew his consent, provided that the other party's consent perseveres. —C.E.

Valladolid, city in northern Spain, built on the site of an ancient Roman city, and a probable Moorish foundation with the name Uld or Walid. The first mention of Valladolid is found in the “Crónica de Cardeña,” its real founder being the Castilian Count Ansúrez (1074) who conferred upon the abbot and chapter of the collegiate church vast territories. Erected as a diocese in 1595, with the first bishop, Valladolid was not created an archdiocese until 1857. It possesses a magnificent cathedral (1595), the church of S. Pablo, founded in 1276, and a famous university, originating, c. 1290, and authorized in 1346. The archdiocese comprises 150,000 Catholics, 241 churches and chapels, 251 priests, 205 religious, 837 sisters.

Valladolid, University of. The date of its foundation is uncertain although it probably was founded between 1290-94. It was flourishing in 1293 and was approved by Pope Clement VI, 1346; noted for its school of Piracy. It came under the control of the state in the time of King Charles III (1759-88).—C.E.

Valleymfield, Diocese of, Canada; embraces Beauharnois, Chateauguay, Huntingdon, Soulanges, and Vaudreuil counties; suffragan of Montreal. Bishops: Joseph Méndez Emaré (1892-1922); Raymond-Marie Rouleau, O.F. (1923-29); Joseph A. Langlois (1929). Churches, 48; priests, secular, 106; priests, regular, 16; religious women, 375; colleges, 2; normal school, 1; academies, 25; parochial schools, 274; institutions, 7; Catholics, 57,937.

Valleymfield College, Valletta, Quebec, Canada; founded 1893; conducted by the diocesan clergy; classical and commercial courses; students, 305.

Valverde, Vincent de (d. 1541), Dominican missionary, b. Oropesa, Spain; d. Island of Puna, near Guayaquil. He accompanied Pizarro as a missionary on his intended voyage of conquest to Peru, instructed and baptized Atahualpa, the Incan monarch, and was made first Bishop of Cuzco. At the assassination of Pizarro he fled from Peru and on his way to Panama was killed by the Indians at Puna.—C.E.

Vancouver, Archdiocese of, British Columbia; Vicariate Apostolic of British Columbia, 1863; Diocese of New Westminster, 1880; Archdiocese of Vancouver, 1908; comprises the Province of British Columbia, south of 53° N. lat. and east of Georgia Strait. Suffragans: Victoria, and the Vicariate Apostolic of the Yukon and Prince Rupert. Bishops: Louis Joseph D’Herbolnez, O.M.I. (1864-90); Paul Dubrion, O.M.I. (1890-99). Vaso, emblem in art associated with St. Mary Magdalen, commemorating the vase or box of ointment with which she anointed the feet of Our Lord.

Vatican (perhaps Etruscan place-name, Vaticum), collection of buildings in Rome, grouped around the palace of the pope. Pope Symmachus (498-514) was the first to build a residence near the ancient Basilica of St. Peter. By extensive purchases of land the medieval popes acquired possession of the entire Vatican Hill. From time to time the Vatican was enlarged, until it has become the largest palace in the world. Only a comparatively small portion is residential, the remainder serving the purposes of art and science, or being employed for the administration of the official business of the Church and the marquis of the palace. There are a large number of chapels, the most famous of these being the Sistine Chapel (q.v.). All these buildings are surrounded by fine gardens decorated with marble statues and other works of art. Among the important buildings included in this group are the Cappella Paolina, the Vatican Library (q.v.), the Vatican Archives, the Museo Pio-Clementino, the Vatican Pinacotheca, the Galleries Chiaramonti, the Braccio Nuovo, the Vatican Observatory (q.v.), and a printing office.—C.E.

Vatican Council, the twentieth ecumenical council, opened, 8 Dec., 1869, in the pontificate of Pope Pius IX, in what is now the Vatican City; adjourned indefinitely, 20 Oct., 1870, six weeks after the Piedmontese troops entered the States of the Church. Two important dogmatic Constitutions resulted from the council. The first defends the Catholic doctrine on faith against the heresies of modern rationalism, materialism, and atheism. The second defines the Catholic doctrine on the institution, perpetuity, and nature of the primacy of the Roman pontiff. This Constitution contains the famous definition of papal infallibility: “Faithfully adhering, therefore, to the tradition inherited from the beginning of the Christian Faith, we, with the approval of the sacred council, for the glory of God Our Saviour, for the exaltation of the Catholic religion, and the salvation of Christian peoples, teach and define, as a Divinely revealed dogma, that doctrine concerning faith or morals is to be held by the entire Church, he possesses, in consequence of the Divine aid promised him in St. Peter, that infallibility with which the Divine Saviour wished to have His Church furnished for the definition of doctrine concerning faith or morals; and that such definitions of the Roman pontiff are of themselves, and not in consequence of the Church’s consent, irreformable.”—C.E.

Vatican Library, the fourth papal library. The foundation of this collection was laid by Martin V (1417-31) when he took up his residence at Rome. It was enlarged by Eugene IV, but Nicholas V (1447-55) may be regarded as the real founder; he acquired the imperial library of Constantinople, scattered by the Turks, and upon his death bequeathed 824 codices. It continued to grow under Sixtus IV (1471-84), and Julius II (1503-12), and during the pontificate of Sixtus V (1585-90) a new building was erected and the library assumed its present name. Leo XIII (1878-1903) made important additions, and in 1928 Pius XI accepted the offer of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, to assist in the work of compiling a modern catalogue of the possessions in the Library. At present it contains some 60,000 manuscripts, 7000 innumerably, and 500,000 printed books. Its most famous collections are: that of Fulvio Orsini; the Palatine Library; those of the Dukes of Urbino, Queen Christina of Sweden, the Cardinals Ottoboni, Vatican, and Mai; Giovanni de Rossi; and those of the Borghese, Barberini, and Chigi families. Among its librarians were Bussi, Card. Cervini (Marcellus II), Platina, Inghirami, Leone Allaei, Carini, Card. Ehrle, and Card. Ratti (Pius XI). The Library maintains manuscript-repairing, book-binding, and publishing departments, and in its present capacity of a scientific institution for the use of students it is making one of the greatest contributions to the progress of human thought.—C.E., XV, 290.

Vatican Observatory or Specola Astronomica Vaticana. It had its inception in the so-called “Tower of the Winds,” erected by Gregory XIII (1582-1585) as a convening place for the scholars delegated to reform the calendar. It was equipped with the best instruments available for observing aerial phenomena, and in 1796 the upper part of the tower was devoted to an observatory with the addition of several instruments. Here from 1800-21 Gilli made his noted series of meteorological observations, with instrument readings twice daily. The instruments were later removed to the Roman College, but on the loss of this to the Church they were retransferred to the Vatican and augmented by the collection of instruments presented to Leo XIII in 1888. A second tower, 435 yds. from the Gregorian, a part of the ancient Leonine Fortress, was ceded by Leo XIII to the Vatican Observatory for the purpose of continuing Argelander’s observations to fainter magnitudes by means of photography, and a number of volumes were published on the subject. This work was carried on under the direction of Francesco Denza, Barnabite, who founded the Italian Meteorological Society. With the appointment of Cardinal Maffi to the presidency of the Specola, in 1904, the Gregorian Tower was abandoned to historical archives, and the second round tower of the old Leonine Fortress, with the adjoining summer residence of Leo XIII, was devoted to astronomy. The two old towers were joined by a bridge over the fortification wall, along which various astronomical instruments are now stationed. The second tower, now called Torre Pio, contains a sixteen-inch visual telescope. The observatory has been further enlarged by the addition of a valuable astronomical library.—C.E.

Vatican State (Vatican City), the territory in which the Holy See possesses full property rights, and over which it exercises exclusive and absolute power and sovereign jurisdiction. Its boundaries were determined by the Lateran Treaty, 11 Feb., 1929. In extent it embraces little more than the area of St. John Lateran, St. Mary Major, and St. Paul, with the buildings attached to these; the edifice of San Callisto near Santa Maria in Trastevere; the papal palace of Castel Gandolfo; the property sites on the Janiculan Hill of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, and other properties in this neighborhood, formerly belonging to the State, the ex-convent buildings annexed to the Basilica of the Twelve Apostles, and to the churches of Sant’ Andrea della Valle and San Carlo ai Catanari; the palaces of the Dataria, the Cancellaria, the Propagation of the Faith in the Piazza di Spagna, the Holy Office, the Convertendi, and the palace of the Vicariate; about 160 acres in all. The Vatican State was restricted to this small area at the express wish of the pope, in order to manifest to the world that the object in acquiring territory was to safeguard the independence of the Holy See, and not the attainment of political power and kingly splendor. Its position in the international sphere is that of a neutral and inviolable territory. Its subjects, numbering about 300, for the most part employees of the Vatican and their families, are voluntary subjects, free to depart at will. There is no army, and practically no paraphernalia of a civil government. Its spiritual affairs are in charge of a special Vicar General assisted by a parish priest.—Treaty and Concordat between The Holy See and Italy, Official Documents, Wash., 1929. (M. E. B.)

Vaudreuil, Philippe de Rigaud, Marquis de (d. 1725), Governor of Canada. b. Languedoc, France; d. Quebec. He served as colonel in the king’s musketeers before his arrival in Canada. In 1687, in charge of a marine detachment, Made governor of Montreal, 1688, he was loved by the people, and feared by the Indians; he fortified the country and encouraged agriculture and commerce.—C.E.

Vedanta, the name of an ancient philosophy of India. As interpreted by three organizations, established in the United States, numbering less than 200 members, it means literally “end of all wisdom.”

Vedas (Skt., veda, knowledge, sacred book), in a specific sense, the sacred books of ancient India; in a general sense it includes, in addition to these books, the theological and philosophical literature attached thereto. Usually, however, it refers to the four collections of hymns and prayers for ritualistic purposes, the fourth of which was not originally regarded as canonical. The Rig-Veda (veda of verses), the oldest and most important, is the earliest record of the mythology of an Indo-European people. Its 1028 hymns, invocations to the deities, contain strong elements of nature worship. Its poetry shows a background of sacerdotal refinement and culture. The Sama-Veda (veda of chants) was composed in 1799, and contains 49 stanzas, all of which were taken from the Rig-Veda. It served as a text-book for the priest at the Soma sacrifice. The Yajur-Veda (veda of sacrificial prayers) is made up largely of verses from the Rig-Veda. It was used for the entire sacrificial rite and was therefore to the Hindus the most important of all the Vedas. The Atharva-Veda (veda of the acharvans or priests) is next in importance; it is essentially religious in character and not connected with the ritual of the Soma sacrifice. It consists chiefly of spells and incantations intended to curse as well as to bless.—C.E.

Veil, Religious, covering for the head and shoulders worn by women. Among the religious orders several kinds are in use: the veil of probation, usually white, given to novices; the veil of profession, given at the pronunciation of the vows; the veil of virginal consecration given to virgins twenty-five years of age; the veil of ordination given to a nun at the age of forty, with the privilege of intoning the office and reading the homilies in choir; the veil of prelature, a reward given to
To the last decade of his life belong the "Spinners," fine "Innocent X," of the Doria Pamphili palace. The veil of the Romans was large and flame-colored or yellow; it covered the bride's head and fell behind to her feet. At the end of the ceremony it was removed by the bridgroom. Christians employed this style until the 5th century, although a little later it might be purple or white, and was sometimes worn during the time of betrothal. In the 9th century a veil was held over the married couple while they were solemnly blessed; until recently this practise existed in parts of France, and continues to be used in Spain according to the Mozarabic Rite. Some rituals have prescribed that the veil completely cover the bride and only the shoulders of the groom, in accordance with the particular consecration of the bride. Today the veil is usually white and long. — C. E.

Veils, Liturgical. The ciborium veil is a white silk veil with which the ciborium is draped when it contains the small Hosts used for the Communion of the people. The humeral veil (Lat., humerus, shoulder) is a long, wide, oblong piece of silk or gold cloth, suitably ornamented, worn over the shoulders by a priest when he blesses the people with the Blessed Sacrament or carries it in procession. He covers his hands with the ends of the veil so that it, and not his hands, touches the monstrance which contains the Blessed Sacrament. He also wears the veil when transferring the Blessed Sacrament from one place to another. At these times the veil is always white silk or gold cloth. When the subdeacon carries the chalice or holds the paten during a solemn Mass, he uses a humeral veil of the same color as the vestments. The linctheum was an ancient veil covering the chalice and paten; the linctheum pectorale is used at pontifical Mass to cover the hands of the subdeacon. — MacMahon, Liturgical Catechism, Dublin, 1926.

Velasquez, və-ləskĭz, DİeG̱O ROdrIgüEz de siLva y (1599-1650), famous Spanish painter, b. Seville; d. Madrid. At thirteen he was the pupil for a short time of the irascible Francisco de Herrera, and studied afterwards with Francisco Pacheco for five years, learning the essentials of art from both, but working much from nature. On his second visit to Madrid, in 1623, he was named painter of the household by Philip IV, the two becoming intimate friends for life. On the advice of Rubens, who visited Madrid in 1628, he went to Italy for two years. He spent half of the time in Rome, where he painted the well-known "Forge of Vulcan." To the two decades after his return belong numberless portraits of the king and the royal family, the "Christ on the Cross" of the Prado, and the famous "Surrender at Breda" or "The Lances," considered one of the greatest historical paintings in the world. On a second visit to Rome, in 1649, he painted the fine "Innocent X," of the Doria Pamphili palace. To the last decade of his life belong the "Spinners," and "Las Meninas" (Prado), the last a portrait of the Infanta Margarita and her maids. In 1659 he received the Order of Santiago, the legend being that Philip IV himself painted the decoration on the portrait of the artist in "Las Meninas." Other well-known pictures of this superb portrait-painter and early master of naturalism are the spirited little "Don Baltasar Carlos," "The Coronation of the Virgin," "The Espana," "The Toppers," and the "Venus with a Mirror." — C. E.; Lucas, Velasquez, N. Y.

Ven. = venerabilis, venerables (venerable).

Venantius (Wigand), Saint, martyr, d. Came­rino, Italy, 259. He professed his faith publicly at the age of fifteen, was thrown to the wild beasts, but was miraculously preserved. He was then thrown down a precipice and his head was struck off. Buried at Camerino. Feast, R. Cal., 18 May.— C. E., XV, 619; Butler.

Venerable, title given to Servants of God after the Congregation of Rites decides that they have practised virtue to an heroic degree. (B.D.)

Veneration of the Saints. Recognizing the work of God manifested in the saints by abundant grace, their cooperation with it, and their position in the Communion of Saints according to the Divine plan, the Christian soul is led to admire them, to beg for their prayers with God, and to desire to imitate them. See DULIA. — (A. Z.)

Venezuela, republic in South America, admin­istered by a president and Congress; area, 993,874 sq. m.; est. pop., 3,053,497. The religion of Venezuela has always been Catholic. Missionary work was begun by the Capuchins, but the civilization of the natives was accomplished chiefly by the Franciscans and Dominicans, with the secular clergy. At the constitution of the Colombian na­tionality, 1824, the State assumed the same control of the churches of America which the pope had formerly granted to Catholic monarchs; this patronato, as it was known, was retained by Vene­zuela, despite the clergy's protests, when it left the Colombian union. The earliest conflict between Church and State was over the refusal of Abp. Méndez to subscribe to the Constitution of 1830, because it did not mention Catholic religion. Later the conflict between Abp. Guevara and Guzmán Blanco caused systematic persecutions and the introduction of a reprehensible element into the clergy, until Guevara resigned, 1875. The re­vival was slow, but since Guzmán Blanco's fall, the Church's position has been more favorable. In 1886 the government invited the Sisters of Charity of St. Joseph of Tarbes to take charge of hospitals, and to open girls' schools and colleges. The Spanish Sisters of Charity of St. Anne, the Little Sisters of the Poor of Maiquetia, the Servants of the Most Holy Sacrament, and the Franciscan Sisters followed at intervals. Capuchin monks were intro­duced by the government, 1891, and the Salesians arrived, 1894. Augustinian Recollects came, 1899, and in 1903 the Sons of Mary Immaculate and the Dominican Fathers established themselves throughout the republic. These missionaries converted savages, ministered to settlers, founded churches and schools, and helped the Church regain her former position. Religious instruction in schools and colleges is authorized by the State, and today Catholicism is the state religion, but there is toleration of all others. In 1929 Venezuela included the following ecclesiastical divisions:

Venial Sin (Lat., venia, pardon), an offense against God which does not deprive us of His friendship and which merits only temporal punishment. It is called venial because it is more easily pardoned than mortal sin. Venial sin, however slight it may be, is, nevertheless, an injury done to God. It diminishes the fervor of charity, and causes us to tend to God with less affection than He deserves. It dims the light of the intellect, weakens the will, and so disposes to mortal sin. It deprives man of many degrees of grace and glory. Unless expiated, it will merit the pains of purgatory.

Veni Creator Spiritus, or CREATOR-SPIRIT, ALL-DIVINE, hymn for Vespers and Terce on the feast of Pentecost and throughout the octave. Styled "the most famous of hymns," it is sung at the election of popes, consecration of bishops, ordination of priests, dedication of churches, at councils and synods, and before sermons. It was written probably by Rabanus Maurus (776-856) and is the only Breviary hymn retained in the American prayer-book. Approximately 60 translations are in existence; the English title given is by J. Aylward. The fourth verse reads:

Kissed with fire brought from above
Each sense, and fill our hearts with love;
And grant our flesh, so weak and frail,
The strength of Thine which cannot fail.

VENI SANCTE SPIRITUS, See COME, HOLY GHOST, SEND DOWN THOSE BEAMS.

Verapoly, Archidioce of, India; vicariate, 1853; archdiocese, 1886; bounded n. by the Ponany River, e. by the western Ghauts, w. by the Diocese of Cochinn, and s. by that of Quillon, the Rani River forming the boundary between them; suffragan: Quillon; entrusted to the Discalced Carmelites (Spanish Province). First vicar Apostolic: Joseph of S. Maria de Sebastiani, O.D.C. (1660-63). Last vicar Apostolic: Bernardino Baccinelli of St. Teresa, O.D.C. (1859-68; received titular archbishopric). Archbishops: Leonard Mellano of St. Louis, O.D.C. (1868-97); Bernard of Jesus Aragon, O.D.C. (1897-1919); Angel Mary Perez y Cecilia, O.D.C. (1919); residence at Ernakulam (Cochin State). Verbiest, Ferdinand (1623-88), Jesuit missionary and astronomer, b. Pitthem, Belgium; d. Peking. In 1638 he accompanied Father Martini to China and after a year at Macao assisted and later replaced Father Schall in his astronomical labors at Peking. By demonstrating the superiority of European astronomy over the ancient astronomy of China, he succeeded in winning the favor of the emperor and secured the return of the missionaries imprisoned during the persecution of 1664, thereby gaining for the Church greater security than it had had before the outbreak. He was the author of several astronomical works in Chinese.

Verbum supernum prodiens [E Patris], or CELESTIAL WORD, TO OUR EARTH, hymn for Matins on Sundays and week-days during Advent; Ambrosian school, 5th or 6th century. About 30 translations are in existence; the English title given is by W. Courthope. C.E.; Brit.

Verbum supernum prodiens [Nec Patris], or THE HEAV'NLY WORD PROCEEDING FORTH, hymn for Lauds on the feast of Corpus Christi. It was written by St. Thomas Aquinas (1227-74) and has about 25 translations; the English title given is by J. Neale. The fifth and sixth verses, known as the "O Salutaris Hostia" (q.v.), are often sung at Benediction. The fourth verse reads:

By birth, our fellow-man was He;
Our meat, while sitting at the board;
He died, our ransom to be;
He ever reigns, our great reward.

Verdi, Giuseppe (1813-1901), operatic composer, b. Le Roncole, Parma, Italy; d. Villa S. Agata, near Busseto. He manifested more than ordinary musical ability from early youth, mastering composition under Provesi at Busseto, 1826-29, and Lavigna at Milan, 1831-33. His first opera, “Oberto,” was performed in 1830. The first period of development includes “Ernani” (1844) and ends with “Luise Miller” (1849). A new phase began in 1861 with “Rigoletto,” followed by “II Trovatore” (1853), “La Traviata” (1853), “Un Ballo in Maschera” (1859) and “La Forza del Destino” (1862). “Don Carlos” (1867) and “Aida” (1871) represent a third style, while the “Otello” and “Falstaff” of 1887 and 1893 reveal the mature insight of his later mellow years, the last-named being the remarkable work of an octogenarian. He was not without power in sacred composition, his “Messa da Requiem” (1874) and “Pater Noster” (1880) placing him with distinction among church musicians.—C.E.

Verrocchio, vär-rök'ke-o, ANDREA DEL (1435-88), sculptor and painter, b. Florence; d. Venice. He was a pupil of Donatello, and a teacher of Leonardo da Vinci and Perugino. His masterpiece, the bronze equestrian statue of Bartolommeo Colleoni, in Venice, is considered the finest in the world. Other well-known pieces are the "David" of the Bargello, and the "Boy with a Fish" in the Palazzo Vecchio. The only example of his work as a painter is "The Baptism of Christ" in the Academy of Florence. —C.E.

Versicle (Lat., versiculum, short verse), a part of the Responses in the Divine Office, usually very brief or only part of a verse. (Ed.)

Versions of the Bible. Greek: Septuagint or Alexandrine Version, the first and foremost translation of the Hebrew Bible, made in the 3rd and 2nd centuries B.C., the official text of the Greek Church; Version of Aquila, which Origen and St. Jerome found of value in the study of the original text; Versions of Theodotion, Symmachus, and others. Versions from the Septuagint: Vetus Italia or Old Latin; Egyptian or Coptic; Ethiopic and Amharic; Gothic; Armenian; Georgian or Grusian; Syrian; Slavonic; and Arabic. Versions directly from the Hebrew: Chaldaic versions or Targums; Syriac, including the Peshitto; Arabic; Persian; Samaritan Pentateuch; Vulgate; and other Latin versions. Hebrew Versions of the N.T.: In 1537 Sebastian Münster published an old translation of the Gospel of St. Matthew; the four Gospels were done into classic Hebrew by a converted Jew, Giona, at Rome (1668); the first complete N.T. in Hebrew was made by Elias Hutter and published in the Nuremberg Polyglot (1600); a corrected N.T. in Hebrew was given out by Caddock (Lond., 1798); a number of Bible Society versions have appeared since 1818; and, in 1886, Reichard and Biessenholtz edited a text with accents and vowels, Versions from Mixed Sources: Italian; Spanish; Portuguese; Basque; French; German; Dutch and Flemish; Scandinavian (Danish, Swedish, Norwegian, Icelandic); Finnish (Estonian, Laplandish); Hungarian; and Celtic (Irish, Scotch, Breton, and Welsh). Miscellaneous versions: Aleutian; Ainu; Anou; Battak; Benga; Bengali; Chinese; Gipoy or Roman; Hindo; Hindustani; Japanese; Javanese; Mexican; and Modern Greek. English Versions may be classified chronologically as follows: (1) Before Eighth Century: Cadmon. (2) Eighth to tenth Century: Bede's translation of John; Glossed Psalters, including the Vespasian Psalter; Paris Psalter, called, by some, King Alfred's; Lindisfarne Gospels (Durham Book; Book of St. Cuthbert; Northumbrian Gloss); Rushworth Gospels; West-Saxon Psalters; Ælfric's Version. (3) Eleventh to Fourteenth Century: in French. (4) Fourteenth Century and after: (a) Pre-Wycliffite: West Midland Psalter; Rolle's Psalter; and others. (b) Wycliffite: Early Version; Later Version. (c) Printed Bibles: Tyndale; Coverdale; Matthew; Taverner; Great Bible; Whittingham (?); Genevan Bible ("Breeches" Bible); Bishops' Bible; Reims ("Rhemes") N.T., 1582, and Douai ("Do­way") O.T., 1609, revised later by Challoner, Ken­rick (F.P., Abp. of Baltimore), and Shea (J.G.); Authorized or "King James" (a rare edition of 1717 is called the "Vinegar" Bible because of a misprint for "vineyard"); Revised (1851-84) American Revised Version (1900-01). Manuscripts of the Bible are written, as opposed to printed, copies of the original text, or of a version, either of the whole Bible or of a part thereof. There are: Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Syriac, Armenian, and Coptic MSS.; other versions are not important. MSS. may be divided into two kinds, papyrus and vellum. In the Roman Empire of the first three centuries papyrus was the ordinary writing-material; it was made out of strips of pith of the Egyptian water-plant, and was very fragile and impracticable for book form. It is likely that the N.T. writers or their scribes used ink and rolls of papyrus (2 John, 12), but these probably perished towards the end of the 1st or the opening of the 2nd century. Vellum had been used before the time of Christ and during the time of the Apostles (2 Tim., 4); in the 3rd century, vellum and the codex, or book form, were used instead of papyrus and the roll form. Hebrew MSS. These are the pre-Massoretic (Massorah, the textual tradition of the Hebrew Bible) and the Massoretic texts. Of the former, the earliest Hebrew MS., and the oldest extant Bible MS., is the Nash papyrus; four fragments, which, when pieced together, give 24 lines of a pre-Massoretic text of the Ten Commandments and the Shemot (a collection of passages recited as a confession of faith). Another pre-Massoretic text is the Samaritan Pentateuch, but the earliest Samaritan MS. extant is that of Nabûšu (12th or 13th century). Mention must be made of the non-Massoretic Hebrew MSS. of Ecclesiasticus (10th or 11th century). Probably the earliest Massoretic MSS. are "Prophetarum Posterioriorum Codex Byz­antinus Petroleitanus" (A.D. 916), the St. Peter'sburg Bible (A.D. 1009), and "Codex Oriental. 4445," Greek MSS. These are divided into two kinds, according to their style of writing, uncials and minuscules. The former were written between the 4th and 10th centuries, with large and disconnected letters; the latter show a form of writing so fully developed that, with the exception of the responses in the Divine Office, usually very brief or only part of a verse. The former, the earliest Hebrew MS., and the oldest extant Bible MS., is the Nash papyrus; four fragments, which, when pieced together, give 24 lines of a pre-Massoretic text of the Ten Commandments and the Shemot (a collection of passages recited as a confession of faith). last two contain the complete Bible, the Cod. Vat. lacks parts of Genesis, 1 and 2 Machabees, portions of 2 Kings, 2, Psalms, 106-137, parts of Hebrews, 1 and 2 Timothy, Titus, and the Apocalypse; the Cod. Alex. lacks only Psalms, 1, 20 to 80, 11. There are 2328 N.T. Greek MSS. extant, but only about 40 contain, either entire or in part, all the books of the N.T. There is only one papyrus MS. important to the text-critic, the Oxynyxus Pap. 657 (3rd-4th century); it preserves about a third of the Epistle to the Hebrews. There are about 160 vellum uncial of the N.T. There are 31 codices of the N.T. MSS. Latin MSS. These are divided into the Old and the Vulgate. The Old Latin are 40 in number, including: Cod. Vercellensis (4th century), Cod. Palatines (5th century), Cod. Monacensis (6th or 7th century), and Cod. Monacensis (6th or 7th century), which contain the Gospels; Cod. Veronensis (5th century) and Cod. Brixianus (6th century), which contain the Gospels on purple vellum; Cod. Gigas (13th century), a complete Bible; and Cod. Bobiensis (4th or 5th century), which contains Mark, 8 to 16, and Matt. 1-15. There are about more than 8000 MSS. of the Vulgate extant. The principal ones are: Cod. Amiatinus (8th century), Cod. Censis (9th century), Cod. Sangermanensis (9th century), Cod. Vercellensis (9th century), Cod. Karolins (9th century), Cod. Valliciullanus (9th century), all of which contain a complete Bible; Cod. Donum- mon (8th century), Cod. Oxoniensis (7th century), Cod. Kemensis or Book of Kells (8th century), and Cod. Lindisfarne (7th century), containing the Gospels; Cod. Fuldecensis (AD. 541-546), a complete N.T.; Cod. Oxoniensis or Selden Acts (8th century), containing the Acts; Cod. Stonyhurstensis (7th century), containing John; and Cod. Harleianus 6th century (7th century), containing the Epistles and the Apocalypse, Syriac MSS. (1) Old Syriac: The Curetonian Syriac, containing five chapters of John, large portions of Matthew and Luke, and Mark, 16, 17-20; the Sinaic Syntaxe, containing the Gospels in great part, though not entire; both these are assigned to the 5th century. (2) The Diatessaron, a harmony of the Gospels, written by Tatian c. A.D. 170. (3) The Peshitto, MSS. numbering 125 of the Gospels, 58 of the Acts and Catholic Epistles, and 67 of St. Paul’s Epistles. (4) The Philoxenian Syriac Version of the N.T., coming down to us only in the four minor Catholic Epistles, not included in the original Peshitto. (5) The Harleian Syriac Version of the N.T., represented by some 35 MSS. dating from the 7th century and later. (6) The Palestinian Syriac Version of the N.T. Armenian MSS. These date from 887 and are numerous. Coptic MSS. (1) Sahidic: the Apocalypse is the only book of the O.T. which has come down complete in a single MS. of this dialect of Upper Egypt. (2) Bohairic: the Curzon Catena is the earliest extant Bohairic MS. of the Gospels; it is dated 889. (3) Middle Egyptian fragments: the largest of these is a 6th-century palimpsest of John, 3 and 4.—C.E., XV, 367; IX, 627; Grannan; Pope.

Vespers, Sicilian, a popular uprising which began in Palermo on Easter Tuesday, 31 March, 1382. So-called because of a 15th-century legend which speaks of the church bells ringing in the evening of their own accord, to call the people to arms. Charles of Anjou, Count of Provence and brother of St. Louis, King of France, was then King of the Two Sicilies; and the revolt, in which 8000 French were massacred, was caused by the vexatious searches which the French governor of Palermo carried on to prevent the inhabitants from bearing arms. As a result of it Charles was forced to give up his plans for a crusade against Constantinople and subsequent control of the Mediterranean. He marched with all his troops to Messina, only to become involved in a long struggle with the House of Aragon, whose king, Pedro III, aided the Sicilians in freeing themselves from French domination. At this period the Greek Emperor, Michael Paleologus, was carrying on negotiations with Pedro of Aragon, in which a Sicilian, Giovanni da Procida, seems to have acted as agent; but there is no evidence that either the king or the emperor... was in any way responsible for the uprising.—C.E.

Vespuci, Amerigo. See Amerigo Vespucci.

Vessel of Election, expression applied to St. Paul by Our Lord, meaning a chosen instrument to carry the Gospel to the whole world. The metaphor may be that St. Paul is as a potter’s vessel moulded by the Great Artificer for a special work (Acts, 9:17; Rom., 9).

Vessel of Singular Devotion, title applied to Mary, the Mother of God, as a vase made to contain things of great spiritual worth. It is an invocation in the Litany of Loreto.—Henry, Catholic Customs and Symbols, N. Y., 1925.

Vestments (Lat., vestimentum, covering), garments worn by the clergy according to the regulations of the Church, in performing sacred ceremonies, especially at the celebration of Mass, administration of the Sacraments, blessings, processions, etc. Those of the priest at Mass consist of the amice, alb, cincture, maniple, stole, and chasuble; for blessings, the surplice and cope, also at Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament, at the Asperges before High Mass on Sundays and at the Misereere before and after the Absolution at Requiem Mass; in addition, the dress of a bishop includes the tunic, dalmatic, sandals, buskins, gloves, and mitre, while that of a bishop further comprises the palliun. The vestments of the pope include all these and the pallium, the palliun. The vestments of an archbishop further comprises the am ice, alb, cincture, maniple, and dalmatic, while the deacon wears also the subdeacon wears the am ice, alb, cincture, maniple, and dalmatic, while the deacon wears also the stole. The liturgical colors are white, red, green, violet, and black. Each of these vestments is described under its title.—C.E.; MacMahon, Liturgical Catechism, Dublin, 1926.

Veto, Royal, the right of rejecting the nominees to Catholic bishoprics in Ireland and England which the British government sought to vest in the king, ostensibly as a guarantee of the Holy See’s Catholic loyalty, and as a consequence, allusion to the renunciation of the Penal laws and of Catholic Emancipation. With the exception of expressions of opinion in 1783 and 1790, tolerating the proposal under proper restrictions, every future pronouncement of the Irish bishops absolutely rejected the proposal. In England it was more favorably received and became a cause of contention between the Irish bishops and the English Catholic Board, who obtained from the Secretary of Propaganda, Mgr. Quarantelli, the rescript of Feb., 1814, declaring that the securities for the loyalty of bishops, which the government claimed, might be allowed. Pius VII disapproved of the rescript; but on 26 Apr., 1815, Cardinal Litta, Prefect of Propaganda, gave qualified approval of the Veto, and the pope sustained him, pointing out its reasonable necessity under the trying circumstances. The proposal remained in abeyance until through O’Connell and the Catholic Association, Emancipation was won in 1829 without concession of the veto.—Butler, Historical Memoirs of the English, Irish and Scottish Catholics, Lond., 1822; Milner, Supplementary Memoirs of English Catholics.

Veuillot, ve’yo, Louis (1813-83), journalist, b. Boyens, France; d. Paris. Son of a poor cooper, after a primary education he went to work early, in a lawyer’s office. There he showed signs of a literary vocation, read literature and history, and when only seventeen years of age became editor of a newspaper at Rouen, and then at Périgueux. He then entered Parisian journalism and during the course of a journey to Rome (1838) was converted, and from that time on devoted all his energies to the cause of Catholic journalism. He became editor-in-chief of the moribund “Univers” and made it a powerful organ, dreaded by the enemies of the Church. In 1860 the paper was suppressed for having published an Encyclical Letter of Pius IX, but for seven years Veuillot continued his task in pamphlets and books. In 1867 the “Univers” reappeared and resumed its fight against the combined forces of Atheism and Liberalism. Even bishops opposed Veuillot at times, but Pius IX always stood by him, while recommending him to moderate the tone of his polemics. He was a powerful writer, a master of clear, incisive, witty French, now recognized even by his enemies as one of the five or six great prose writers of France in the 19th century. His “Mélanges” (collected articles in 15 vols.) are invaluable for the religious history of 40 years; his works comprise more than 50 volumes, including “Rome et Lorette,” “Histoire et Fantaisies,” “Les Libé-Penseurs,” “Les Odeurs de Paris,” “Le Parfum de Rome,” “Cah et là,” “Vie de Notre Seigneur Jésus-Christ,” “Le Droit du Seigneur.” His letters (8 vols.) are a delight.—C.E.

Vexilla Regis prodeunt, or AROUND THE ROYAL BANNERS FLY, hymn for Vespers from Passion Sunday to the Wednesday of Holy Week, and on the feasts of the Finding (3 May) and of the Exaltation (14 Sept.) of the Holy Cross. It is also used on Good Friday when the Blessed Sacrament is taken from the Repository to the High Altar. Written by Venantius Fortunatus (530-609), it has approximately 40 translations; the English title given is by W. Blount. The fifth verse reads:

Blest Tree, whose happy branches bore
The wealth that did the world restore;
The beam that did that Body weigh Which raised up hell’s expected prey.

THE HAMBURG BIBLE
Via (Lat., way, road), designation of various ancient roads radiating from Rome. Via ÁEMILIA (Áemilian Way), constructed by Consul M. Áemilius Lepidus, 187 B.C. From Rimini it strikes north-eastward in almost a perfectly straight line for 176 m. to Piacenza. This part of the road is a modern highway, paralleled by a railroad; some of the original bridges still exist. It passes through Cesena, Forli, Faenza, Imola, Bologna, Modena, Reggio, Parma, and Borgot San Donnino. From Piacenza one branch goes by Pavia, Vercelli and Ivrea to Aosta, and crosses into Switzerland at the monastery of the Great St. Bernard. Another branch from Piacenza passes through Turin, and crosses Mt. Cenis into France. All the above-mentioned cities are the seats of Catholic dioceses, and there is thus a straight line of 11 ancient Catholic cathedrals stretching across northern Italy for 176 m.; the greatest distance apart being 25 m. (Bologna to Modena), and the shortest, two of 10 m. each (Forli to Faenza; and Faenza to Imola). Via Appia (Appian Way), oldest and most celebrated of the Roman roads, 363 m. long, built by the censor Appius Claudius Cæcicus, 312 B.C., from the Porta Capena, Rome, to Capua, through Aricia, Tres Tabernae, Appii Forum, Terracina, Fundi, Formis, Minturnae, and Sinussa. It was extended to Beneventum through Calatia and Caudium, and e. 244 B.C. to Brundusium by way of Venusia, Tarasium, and Uria. Near Rome, the road is lined with remains of sepulchral monuments. Here are the cemetery of St. Niconius, the tomb of Cecilia Metella, and the Hebrew catacombs of Vigna Randanini. Just outside the Porta Appia was a temple of Mars, and beyond were the Baths of Caracalla, the Arch of Trajan, still standing, and the Porta Capena. By this gate and road Paul entered Rome on his way from Appii Forum (Acts, 28). VIA FLAMINIA (Flaminian Way), northern road from Rome to Rimini, 222 m. long, constructed by Caius Flaminius, 222 B.C. It leaves Rome by the Flaminian Gate, crosses the Milvian Bridge, passes through Aquaviva, Narni, Foligno, Nocera, and Possombrone. Though not the shortest, the Flaminian Way was the usual route of the Roman legions into Gaul and thence to Britain; hence Card. Wiseman's famous pastoral letter to the English Catholics on the restoration of the hierarchy, 1850, dated "From the Flaminian Gate," had a sinister significance to certain bigoted Protestants in high places in England, and was one of the causes of the absurd Ecclesiastical Titles Act of 1850. VIA NOMENTANA (Nomentanian Way), road 14 m. long, running north-eastward from Rome to Nomentum (Mentana). Here are situated the cemetery of St. Nicomedes in the Villa Patrizi; the basilicas of St. Agnes and St. Constantia, the former containing the famous crypt of St. Emmerentiana; and the burial-place of the martyrs Alexander and Eutropius. It was originally called Via Flaminia, from the Latin town of Ficula, near Rome. Later it was extended to Nomentum, and shortly beyond there became the Via Salaria. A modern highway follows it as far as Nomentum. VIA OSTIENSIS (òs-ti-én-sis), ancient road between Rome and Ostia, where are buried Commodilla, St. Paul (at Lucina), St. Timothy, martyrs under Diocletian, St. Thecla, and formerly St. Cyriacus. VIA SALARIA (Salarian Way), ancient road, 151 m. long, from Rome to Castrum Truentinum (Porto d'Ascoli), by way of Reate and Asculum. The Sabines used this highay to carry salt from the beds in the Tiber. Portions of the road still exist.

Via Media, a term used to describe the position taken by leaders of the Oxford Movement (q.v.) to describe the Anglican ideal. The term was first used by Newman in his book of that name. The gist of the position is that the Church of England was placed as a middle road between Rome and Protestantism. Retaining Catholic worship, an hierarchical clergy, and historic connection with the past, yet not accepting modern developments in doctrine or practise, an at the same time holding to the Evangelical principles of personal holiness and private interpretation, the promulgators of the Via Media regarded it as a link which might reunite all Christendom. The position, though historically unsound, and a mere fiction, can be made very attractive and has won many followers. (F. K.)

Viaticum (Lat., viaticus, pertaining to a journey), the reception of Holy Communion in any probable danger of death which is Divinely commanded for all the faithful who have reached the years of discretion. Viaticum is recommended for those who have already communicated the same day before coming into the danger of death. It should not be deferred too long, but a priest may binate or say Mass, not fasting, in the night, if necessary, in order to consecrate for Viaticum.—C.E.; Kaiser, Spiritual Service to the Sick and Dying, N. Y., 1929. (L. P. F.)

Viator, Saint, confessor (c. 360-389), d. monastery of Sceté, Egypt. He was a lector of the monastery of the Sick and Dying, N. Y., 1929. (L. P. F.)

Vicar, Latin, vicis, interchange, in general, a representative or substitute of an ecclesiastical person. The term vicar in a strict sense is applied only to such representatives as have ordinary jurisdiction in the external forum. Thus are to be understood, e.g., the terms vicar Apostolic, vicar general. The term is used, however, also in a broad sense, as when applied to vicars parochial. The office of vicarious substitution is a logical requisite of every well-organized government. Its history in Church Law varies according to the development of its agency to which it is attached. The canonical notion of vicarship in ordinary jurisdiction (i.e., in the external forum) has not been advanced by the Code of Canon Law in its distinct legislation on ordinary vicarious jurisdiction, on vicarious participants in papal and in episcopal jurisdiction, and on the office of vicar general.—C.E.

(H. L. M.)

VICAR APOSTOLIC

Church in regions where the ordinary hierarchy is not yet established. They generally have the same powers as bishops in their own dioceses and the Congregation of Propaganda usually concedes them special privileges. They are appointed to a titular see.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine.

Vicar Capitular (Lat., capitularis, pertaining to chapter), a priest, or higher cleric, elected by the cathedral chapter to govern the diocese during the period of vacancy. In dioceses that have no cathedral chapter, the Board of Consultors elect an administrator. In the early centuries the presbytery governed the vacant diocese. From the 4th century on, metropolitans sent intercessors or visitors to govern vacant sees. Cathedral chapters began to administer dioceses during vacancy about the 8th century, which practise was generally legalized by the authentic collections of Decretals of the 10th century. Chapters exercised this power either in turn, or by delegated vicars. The Council of Trent modified previous legislation along the lines adopted by the present law.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine.

Vicar-Forane (LL., foraneus, foreign), see DEAN.

Vicar-General, a priest, or higher cleric, legitimately deputed to assist the bishop, with ordinary jurisdiction, in the government of the whole diocese. Only one vicar-general should be appointed by the bishop unless diversity of rites or the size of the diocese demand more than one. He should be a priest, at least thirty years of age, well versed in theology and canon law, of sound doctrine, probity of life, and possess prudence and practical experience. His office expires with that of the bishop. About the middle of the 4th century the bishop was assisted by an archdeacon. The latter's office became very important, especially from the 8th to the 12th centuries. From the 13th century on we find the bishop assisted also by vicars-forane and vicars-general. The Council of Trent (1545-63) reduced the office of archdeacon to a mere dignity. The office of the vicar-general since that time gained jurisdictional importance, and was finally regulated by definite legislation in the present Code of Canon Law.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine.

Vicariate Apostolic is a territory in a mission country, or other lands, where the hierarchy is not established. Such a vicariate is usually governed by a titular bishop appointed by the Holy See. He usually has the same powers and faculties as bishops in their own dioceses. The superior of a vicariate Apostolic is called vicar Apostolic and he exercises his rights and privileges at the direction of the Congregation of the Propaganda. —C.E.

Vicar of Christ (Lat., vice, in place of), title of the pope, acting on earth as Head of the Church, and in place of Christ, its Founder, Who is in Heaven.—C.E.

Vice (Lat., vitium, any sort of defect), the contrariety of virtue (q.v.), and, like virtue, a habit inhering in man, the result of repeated acts of sin, and in turn disposing one to further sin. Unlike virtue, however, vice does not exist in its own name; it is not a reality superadded to the soul or its faculties; it is merely the soul inhibiting itself, habitually limiting itself from the perfection to which it should move. Virtue, then, is dominant, and vice is classified only by their opposition to it. Culpability attaches, not to the vice, but to the act from which it originates or to which it gives rise.—C.E.; Rickaby, Ethics and Natural Law, Lond., 1908.

Vicegerent (Lat., vice, in place of; gero, carry on), an auxiliary bishop appointed by the pope to assist the cardinal vicar of the diocese of Rome, with powers equal to his, in matters of jurisdiction and in episcopal ceremonies. By decree of Pius X (1 Jan., 1912) the office was to be suppressed as soon as vacant.—C.E., III, 342.

Vic. For. = vicarius foraneus (vicar-forane).

Vico, Francesco de (1605-48), Jesuit astronomer, b. Macerata, Italy; d. London, England. As director of the observatory at Rome, he discovered six comets. Forced to leave Rome in 1848, he came to Georgetown University, U. S., to take charge of the observatory, but died in a few weeks. Among his astronomical writings are: "The Discovery of six Comets" and "The Discussion of the Rotation-period of the Planet Venus."—C.E.

Victima Paschali, or CHRIST THE LORD IS RISEN TO-DAY, Sequence for the Mass from Easter Sunday to the following Saturday. It is attributed to Wipo, 11th century, and has about 25 translations; the English title given is by J. Leeson.—C.E.; Britt.

VICTOR I, SAINT, POPE (189-198 or 199), b. Africa; d. Rome. In regard to the Easter Controversy he summoned a meeting of Italian bishops, the first Roman synod known, in order to bring about unity in the observance of this festival. Christianity made great advances during his pontificate. He condemned the heresy of Theodotus, which declared that Christ was merely a man endowed with supernatural power by the Holy Ghost at baptism. Jerome calls Victor the first Latin writer in the Church, but the only extant writings are his letters on the Easter controversy. Feast, R. Cal., 28 July.—C.E.; Butler.

VICTOR II (GEBHARD), POPE (1055-57), b. Duchv (vicarius foraneus).—C.E.; L.M.; Butler.

VICTOR III, POPE (1099-1100), b. Arezzo, Italy, Bp. of Eichstätt, 1042, he accepted the papacy on condition that Emperor Henry III restore the lawful possessions of the Holy See. During his pontificate he reformed the clergy through the able Hildebrand; sent greetings to Edward the Confessor; bestowed the pallium on the Abp. Kyriele (Cynesige) of York; and acted as regent to Henry IV, King of Germany. He died upon the conclusion of a council summoned to settle a dispute between the Bps. of Arezzo and Siena in regard to various parishes.—C.E.; Mann.

VICTOR III (DAUERIUS), BLESSED, POPE (1086-87), b. probably Benevento, Italy, 1057; d. Monte Cassino, Italy. A Benedictine, he received the name of Desiderius, became abbot of Monte Cassino and is renowned as one of its greatest abbots. He was a champion of learning and caused 70 books to be copied, among them the works of Bede, Sts. Augustine, Jerome, Basil, and the histories of Josephus, and Gregory of Tours. He renewed and beautified Monte Cassino and numerous churches. He effected an alliance, 1078, between Robert Guiscard and Gregory VII, and secured Norman troops for the pope, 1080. During his short pontificate he confirmed the ban on Henry IV and the antipope Guibert, and sent an army to northern Africa to force the Mohammedan ruler of Tunis to promise tribute to the Holy See and to free Christian slaves.

Holy See and to free Christian slaves.

VICTOR III, POPE (999-1003), b. Rome; d. Benevento, 1003. He is distinguished for his opposition to World Council (1030) of the 1st Lateran. He opposed the doctrine of Cyril and refused to recognize the validity of his acts. During his pontificate the popes chose not to go to the Lateran, but to hold their councils at Rome.

VIENNA, capital of Austria. Originally Celtic (500 B.C.), then an important Roman city (Vindobona), Vienna was probably evangelized in the 3rd century as is evident from the martyrdom of Florian, c. 303. In the 8th century it passed into the possession of the Franks; in the 12th century was the residence of the Babenberg dukes of Austria; and, in the 13th, the capital of the Hapsburg rulers. In 1481, the city, formerly under the jurisdiction of the Bp. of Passau, was erected into a separate diocese. It was governed by many distinguished prelates, who, in 1621, became known as princes of the empire. Vienna is now the seat of an archdiocese, erected in 1722, having 2,596,212 Catholics, 337 religious houses, 533 parishes.-C.E.

VICTOR IV, name of two antipopes. See CONTI, GREGORIO; and OCTAVIAN.

Vidi Aquam, the name of the antiphon for Psalm 117 recited during the sprinkling of the people with holy water before the Mass during Paschal Time. Then often, vigil of a feast (Breviary).

Vigil, name of the vigilia, vigilia noctis (Lat., vigilare, to keep watch), in the language of the Church, a term used to designate the day falling before a more or less prominent feast or solemnity. This day is set apart by the Church as a preparation for the greater day following it. In the early centuries of Christianity the faithful were accustomed to gather in or near a church on the evening preceding great feasts, there giving themselves to prayer, in honor of the mystery of religion, or saint venerated on such feasts. The observance of a fast on the entire day before these feasts became part of the discipline of Christianity. It was in this way Christian tradition was confirmed and perpetuated. It was done in accordance with Our Lord’s counsel, “Watch and pray.” Not all the greater feasts of the year have these vigils. At present the obligation to fast exists only on four vigils, namely, those of Christmas, Pentecost, the Assumption of Our Blessed Lady, hence Ang. 14, and All Saints, or Oct. 31. If the feast having a vigil fall on Monday, its vigil is anticipated on Saturday. The vigils of Christmas and Epiphany are exceptions to this rule, hence get recognition on Sunday. If a vigil with a fast is anticipated on Saturday, the fast for that year is dropped.-C.E., V, 647; Wuest, tr. Mullaney, Materia Liturgica, N. Y., 1926.

Vigilant servants, two parables of the N.T. which though different, intend the same moral. In Luke, 12, the parable follows the admonition of detachment from the world, that is, to be ready for service if the master return from a feast at an unsuspected hour. Then Christ passes, as from the parable to reality: the reward promised, no earthly master would give; but Christ is ready to serve His faithful servant. It explains that the uncertainty of Christ’s second coming (in death and at the end of the world) demands that His Apostles be found engaged in the Master’s work, if they want to receive the reward. In Mark, 13, the parable concludes the great eschatological discourse. It starts with the moral stated first: “Watch and pray.” Then the example is cited of a man who going abroad arranges the work among his servants. The duty of the doorkeeper is to watch, lest his master returning, find him asleep. The consequence of neglect is not stated, it is implied. Christ Himself adds that this doctrine applies not for the Apostles only, but for all. The parable of Mark is read at Mass of a confessor-bishop, and at the anniversary of a bishop’s consecration; that of Luke at the Mass of a confessor, and the feast of Pope Sylvester.—Fonck, tr. Leahy, The Parables of the Gospel, N. Y., 1915.

VIGILIUS, Pope (537-555), d. Syracuse. He was a deacon, and papal representative at Constantinople before his election. During his pontificate he opposed the Monophysites and refused to acknowledge Justianian’s condemnation of the “Three Chapters” (q.v.). To force the Eastern bishops to uphold the Council of Chalcedon he journeyed to Constantinople, discovered the errors of the Council, and satisfied the imperial condemnation by supporting the Acts of the Fifth Ecumenical Synod, 553. His death occurred during his journey to Rome.-C.E.

VIGILIUS, SAINT, martyr (c. 353-405), Bp. of Trent, b. Rome; d. Rendena. Educated at Athens, he went to Trent, 398, where he was chosen bishop.
by popular acclaim. He preached the Gospel in Brescia and Verona, and labored diligently for the conversion of the Arians and idolaters of his diocese. He was stoned to death at Reneda, by the idolaters of Saturn, for throwing the statue of the god into the Saura River. Patron of Trent. Buried in the cathedral of Trent. Feast, 19 July.—C.E.; Butler; Hist. of St. Vincent de Paul, tr. Brady, N. Y., 1908.

Vincent of Lerins, Saint, confessor (c. 400-c. 450), priest and monk in the celebrated monastery on the Island of Lerins, b. Toul, France; d. Island of Lerins. About the year 435 he composed, as an aid to his memory, two "Commonitoria" (memoranda), the first of which only has come down to us. His object in writing it was to provide himself with a general rule whereby to distinguish Catholic truth from heresy. The little work has always been highly esteemed as a splendid justification of the Catholic principle of tradition. In the third chapter Vincent propounds an oft-cited principle, in the words: "Magnopere curandum est ut id teneamus quod ubique, quod semper, quod ab omnibus creditum est" (Care must especially be had that that be held, which was believed everywhere, always, and by all). Chapter 28 contains a fine account, in elegant Latin, of the organic development of doctrine. The importance of Vincent, however, must not be exaggerated. He was a Semi­pelagianist before that sect was condemned, and an opponent of St. Augustine. The "Commonitorium" itself has been characterized as a piece of "veiled controversy" directed against Augustinian doctrine. Neither has the Church ever officially approved of his rule of faith in its exclusive sense. Relics at Lerins. Feast, 24 May.—C.E.; Butler; Tixeront, Handbook of Patrology, St. L., 1920. (r. k.)

Vincent Ferrer, Saint, confessor (1350-1419), b. Valencia, Spain; d. Vannes, Brittany. He was educated at the Dominican school in Barcelona and, 1367, entered the Order. He taught at Valenciennes, 1364-91, and then became counselor to King John of Aragon. He became attached to Pedro de Luna, later the antipope Benedict XIII, and served him at Avignon as adviser. He believed in the legitimacy of Benedict's pontificate and, at first, supported him. However, urged by King Ferdinand of Castile, he withdrew his allegiance from Benedict and propagated the king's declaration withdrawing the states of Castile from the jurisdiction of Benedict. In 1399 he began his mission of preaching throughout Europe, which lasted 20 years. He visited France, Italy, Switzerland, Flanders, Spain, and Austria. Among his converts he numbered Jews, Moors, Waldenses, and Cathari, and brought thousands of peasants into closer union with the Church. He is said by some to have had the gift of tongues, so amazing was the rapidity with which he acquired fluency in the various dialects of western Europe. The utter simplicity of his life, the laborious nature of his work, and the rigorous fasts which he practised are a source of inspiration.

Feast, R. Cal., 5 April.—C.E.; Butler.

Vincent (Lat., conquering). Saint, martyr (304), deacon of Saragossa, b. Huesca, Spain; d. Valencia. He was a pupil of Bp. Valerius of Saragossa, whom he served as deacon. Seized by order of the governor, Dacian, he was cruelly tortured and put to death. Patron of wine-growers. Emblems: gridiron, boat, pruning-knife. Relics in Lisbon.

Feast, R. Cal., 22 Jan.—C.E.; Butler.

Vincent of Beauvais (c. 1190-c. 1264), priest and encyclopedist. He joined the Dominicans in Paris, 1218, and was the author of a colossal book “Speculum majus,” treating of all branches of human knowledge.—C.E.

Vinci, Leonardo di Ser Piero da (1452-1519), painter, sculptor, architect, engineer, and scholar, b. Vinci, near Florence, Italy; d. Cloux, near Amboise, France. He was for a time the pupil of Verrocchio and a co-worker with Perugino, but was mainly self-taught through an intensive study of the various branches of knowledge. He was among the first to make an intelligent investigation of the principles of flying. He made innovations in bridges and war-machines for Ludovico Sforza, whom he served as engineer and artist in Milan (1482-99), and having been invited to France as a painter, by Francis I, in 1516, he died while planning the canalization of the Loire. In art he may be called the first of the moderns. He combined exact scientific knowledge with fine idealism. One of his earliest works was “The Virgin of the Rocks,” of which he made two slightly different originals, one now in the Louvre and one in the National Gallery of London. There are also two well-known versions of his “St. Anne and the Virgin,” the painting in the Louvre, and the cartoon in the London Academy. The famous “Last Supper,” painted 1498, for the refectory of the Dominican convent in Milan, is now much defaced through his method of painting it and later mutilations. The baffling “Mona Lisa,” or “La Gioconda,” bought by Francis I for Fontainebleau and taken later to the Louvre, is the only existing example of his skill in portraiture. Only sketches are left of his noble equestrian statue of Francesca Sforza, set up in clay, but never cast in bronze. His “Treatise on Painting” was printed in Paris in 1651.—C.E.; Taylor, Leonardo the Florentine, N. Y., 1927.

Vine, the symbol of the intimate union between the members of the Church and Christ, as described in John 15; symbol also of the Blood of Christ in the Holy Eucharist.—Plus, tr. Addison, In Christ Jesus, N. Y., 1923. (29.)

Vine, The, a parable of the N.T. (John, 15). It is a discourse after the Last Supper to console the Apostles, saddened over the coming separation from their Master, by showing them how to retain vitally united to Him. Jesus is the Vine: His Humanity makes possible an organic living communion with men; His Divinity makes it possible for Him to supply the life-giving sap that animates and makes fruitful the branches. Baptism actually attaches us to the vine, but we are living branches only when animated by the virtues and sanctifying grace. The sap by which the living branches produce fruit are actual graces that enable them to live according to Christ’s precepts and to make their lives conform to His. The Father is the husbandman, who purges the fruitful branches of faults of character, ignorance, and moral weaknesses. This He does by means of trials, temptations, and suffering which detach them from this world, which exercise and thereby strengthen them in virtue.

Jesus exhorts us to abide in Him, i.e., to make use of the spiritual sap He gives; otherwise we become useless, even dead branches fit only to be cast into the fire. Those who abide in Him need only pray for help to keep progressing; by bringing forth much fruit they glorify the Father, a work that, which Jesus and His true Disciples know none greater or more honorable. This parable is read for the Gospel on the vigil of Sts. Simon and Jude.

Violence, Impediment of. See Abduction.

Violet, liturgical color, signifying penitence. It was introduced in the vestments of the Church during the 13th century, and through tradition and symbolic usage has come to be employed at certain specified times in the liturgy. It is used during Advent and from Septuagesima to Easter; on vigils that are fast days and on ember days, except the vigil of Pentecost, and the ember days which follow that feast; Masses on rogation days, votive Masses of the Passion and of a penitential character, the blessing of candles and of holy water, the administration of the Sacraments of Penance and Extreme Unction, the first part of the baptismal ceremony, and Masses on All Souls’ Day during the Forty Hours’ Devotion require the use of violet vestments. By special privilege, Louvre, and Trianon, have the violet dress and biretta.—Henry, Catholic Customs and Symbols, N. Y., 1925.

Viollet Le Duc, Eugène Emmanuel (1814-79), architect, b. Paris, d. Laussanne. He devoted his efforts to the restoration of medieval Gothic buildings, evolving the complete structure from his comprehension of the spirit of the medieval builders, which he exhibited also in his numerous writings and drawings. Among his restorations are the abbey of St. Denis, the church at Vézelay, that of Our Lady at Châlons-sur-Marne, the cathedrals of Paris, Amiens, and Laon, and the château of Pierrefonds. In 1853 he was made inspector-general of the ancient buildings of France, in 1863 professor at the École des Beaux Arts where he lectured on the development of medieval architecture in France.
His valuable critical works include "Dictionnaire raisonné de l'architecture française du xvième au seizième siècle" (Analytical dictionary of French architecture from the 16th to the 17th century), "Essai sur l'architecture militaire au moyen âge" (Treatise on military architecture of the Middle Ages), "Dictionnaire du mobilier français jusqu'à la Renaissance" (Dictionary of French furniture to the Renaissance), and descriptions of Pierre-fonds, Coucy, and Carcassonne.—C.E.

VIRGIN BIRTH OF CHRIST. This article of faith is expressed in the Creed, professing that Jesus Christ "was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary." Clearly and emphatically the Church always taught and defended this belief against heretics. It implies a miracle, but though the Son of God could have assumed a human body formed according to the laws of nature, it was more fitting that Jesus, to whom the Father says: "I have begotten Thee," be conceived and born of a virgin mother. St. Luke makes it very clear, in the narrative of the Annunciation, that Mary told the angel Gabriel her wish was to remain a virgin and that she gave her consent to the proposal that she should be the mother of the Messias only when she had ascertained that a miracle, attributed to the action of the Holy Ghost, would make her a virgin mother. With admirable reserve, St. Luke in the narrative of Christ's birth, tells us simply: "She brought forth her firstborn." The "Light from Light" proceeded from His mother's womb after the manner of spirits, as a light through a most pure crystal. The fact that Christ is called the firstborn does not prove at all that Mary had other children, but St. Luke prepares us for the narrative of the Presentation in the Temple when, according to the Law, the Virgin Mother offers or redeems her firstborn.—C.E.; Pohl-Preuss, Mariology, St. L., 1922.

VIRGIN ISLANDS

Virginia, the 33rd state of the United States in size, the 20th in population, and the 10th state to be admitted to the Union (26 June, 1788); area, 42,627 sq. m.; pop., 2,306,177; Catholics 36,671, which served afterwards as the cathedral. Included in the state are parts of the Dioceses of Richmond, Wheeling, W. Va., and Wilmington, Del. (qq.v.).

Virginia until religious freedom was enacted by law, 1776. Visiting priests from Maryland, often facing grave danger, served the few Catholics of the region. Among them were Rev. George Hunter, Rev. James Frambach, and Rev. John Carroll, the latter going from his mother's home on Rock Creek in Maryland to the settlement at Aquia Creek near the Potomac, where his sister had married a Catholic named Brent, and where there was a log chapel dedicated to the Blessed Virgin. The permanent establishment of the Church in Virginia dates from the coming of Rev. Jean Dubois from France to Richmond, 1791, bearing letters from Lafayette to distinguished Virginians, among them Patrick Henry. The House of Delegates was put at his disposal for the saying of Mass. He had a worthy successor at Richmond, 1798, in Rev. T. C. Mongrand. Meanwhile churches had begun to be erected. In Alexandria, which had a log chapel, 1776, a church was built, 1796, by Rev. Francis Neale. Norfolk had a church begun the same year by Rev. James Bushe. It was enlarged, 1803, by Rev. John Carroll. In Richmond, Mass was offered for several years in the home of Mrs. Sarah Purell on East Main Street, and after 1815 in a leased building known as "the Chapel," near the corner of Main and 27th Streets. A small wooden church was built in 1825, and in 1834 Rev. Timothy O'Brien commenced the erection of St. Peter's, which served afterwards as the cathedral. Included in the state are parts of the Dioceses of Richmond, Wheeling, W. Va., and Wilmington, Del. (qq.v.).

Catholic influence on the place-names of the state is shown in the following: Cardinal, Carmel, Loretto, St. Charles, St. Davids, St. Just, St. Paul, St. Stephen. The U. S. Religious Census of 1916 gave the following statistics for church membership in Virginia:

Virgin Mary, Devotion to the Blessed, the veneration paid to Mary as Mother of God, by the universal Church. This devotion dates back to the earliest times. Among its many forms of expression are: the Rosary, Litany of Loreto, feasts commemorating different phases of her participation in the Redemption, sodalities devoted to her honor, May devotions, etc. — C.F.; Bridgett, Dowry of Mary, Lond., 1886.

Virgin Mary, The Blessed, the Mother of Jesus Christ, Son of God, Redeemer and Saviour of mankind. Mary was of the tribe of Juda, one of the royal house of David, and according to tradition, the daughter of Joachim and Ann. Predestined to be the Mother of God, she was preserved from all stain of sin, original and actual. At an early age she entered the Temple, where she made a vow of virginity. At about 14 she left the Temple and was betrothed to Joseph, also of the family of David and the one chosen by God to be her protector and the foster-father of her Divine Child, Jesus. Soon after her betrothal to Joseph, the angel Gabriel announced to her that she was to be the Mother of the Messiah, the Son of God; and that she would at the same time be Mother and Virgin. Mary humbly and freely consented: “Behold the handmaid of the Lord: be it done to me according to thy word” (Luke, 1). She hastened on a visit to her cousin Elizabeth, and at their meeting chanted her hymn of praise, the Magnificat. In obedience to a decree of César Augustus, the Roman Emperor, Mary accompanied Joseph to Bethlehem to be enrolled in the census. Here Our Saviour was born. She presented Jesus in the Temple, according to the custom of the Jews. To protect Him from Herod, the Holy Family fled into Egypt. Later they returned to Nazareth. At 12 years of age Jesus accompanied Mary and Joseph to Jerusalem. Jesus remained in Jerusalem, and after three days, Mary and Joseph found Him in the midst of the doctors. They returned to Nazareth where Jesus was subject to His Mother for 18 years. At her request He worked His first public miracle at the marriage at Cana, when He changed the water into wine. Mary accompanied Our Lord in His Passion, and stood at the Cross on Calvary, united to Him in His suffering and Sacrifice, and received the commission to be mother to St. John. She received the body of Jesus from the Cross; was present at His burial; rejoiced in His Resurrection; and was with the Apostles in Jerusalem on Pentecost Sunday. It is thought that she died in Jerusalem, c. 48. According to tradition, she was assumed into Heaven.—C.E.; Pohle-Preuss, Mariology, St. L., 1922. —C.F.; Virgil, Text, title applied to a parable preserved by St. Matthew alone (Matt., 25). It was delivered by Christ sitting on the Mount of Olives and was addressed to His disciples. It forms part of the grand “eschatological discourse” (Matt., 24 and 25), and is a development of the exhortation given in Luke, 12. Christ makes use of a similitude taken from the marriage ceremony and customs of the Jews. The interest of the story centers around the ten young girls forming the necessary quorum for this religious ceremony. They hasten from their respective homes to join the bride and await with her the advent of the bridegroom. All carried lamps. Five of them lacked oil, and never took place at night. Five of the number are called foolish virgins because they had not provided additional oil in case of probable delay. The other five, having prudently prepared for this contingency are termed wise virgins. The bridegroom tarried long; the virgins slept; the lamps burned low. At midnight he comes. The five wise virgins replenished their lamps and go forth to meet the bridegroom. The five foolish virgins vainly seeking oil from their companions go forth in the attempt to purchase it. Meanwhile those prepared enter the festive hall and the doors are closed. Later come the group of foolish virgins seeking admission, but the doors remain tightly shut and the voice of the bridegroom from within declares it is too late: “I know you not.” The whole purpose of the parable is seen in verse 13, when Jesus says: “Watch ye therefore because you know not the day nor the hour.” It teaches vigilance and preparation for the coming of Christ whether at the end of the world or at our own death. This Gospel fragment is read in the Mass for the Common of Virgins.—Madame Cecilia, St. Matthew,
Virgo virginum praecrara. See Starat Mater dogma.

Virtual, being in essence or effect but not in form or appearance; having potency, validity, or essential qualities. Acting or having efficiency without the agency of anything material or sensible. As used in theology and philosophy: opposed to "formal" (essential, physical, real), e.g., anything has formal presence if it is essentially, physically, really present; a man has formal corporeity, i.e., he has a body essentially, physically, really; virtual (productive, effective, moral), e.g., a thing has virtual presence when it is really absent but exerts its force as though it were present; God has virtual, not formal, corporeity, i.e., He is capable of producing bodies but has not a bodyHistonic. Aristotle cloosed to "actual," e.g., a thing is actually wilful if one concentrates his will, attention here and now while performing an act upon the execution of that act; a thing is virtually wilful if while one does not concentrate his will, attention here and now while performing an act upon the execution of that act but being distracted continues the act which he wilfully began and which he would not be now doing had he not wilfully begun it. The will is effectively working but the attention is not focused upon it. As applied to intentions in Moral Theology, one has an actual intention to do something when while doing it he is conscious of his intention to do it; one has a virtual intention to do something when while doing it he is not conscious of his intention but was so conscious of it that he is performing his deed precisely because he had had that intention at the beginning of it; one has an habitual intention when one performs an act out of habit without reverting to his intention. Not the intention but his habit is the cause of the action. One has an interpretative intention to perform an act if it is reasonably presumed and surmised that he had the intention to do it when he performed that act although in reality he may not have had that intention.

Virtue (Lat., virtus, manliness), in its root-idea, all that may become a man; consequently, something stable or habitual element developing the human character. The content of the notion varies with the various ideals of human perfection. Primitive religions and civic cults demand little of the interior man, being content chiefly with his ceremonial acts. Civic cults, however, frequently co-exist with moral philosophies; and to one group of such philosophies (Socratic, Platonie, Aristotle, Stellan, Stote) the western world owes its ideal of humanist virtue: prudence, justice, fortitude, temperance. Christian virtue does not begin with man, but with God, and the authentic Christian virtue is therefore theological, i.e., produced in the soul by the indwellinng Blessed Trinity; it is divinization, not humanization, and it appropriates the old name of virtue only because, in view of the Redemption, it befits man to receive the Divine. The three Christian virtues are thus faith, hope, charity (1 Cor., 13). The N.T. does not mention the cardinal virtues as such nor all of them by name, though they are all recommended in various ways. Later Christian writers, however, point out certain practical or moral habits developed in us by the combined action of God and ourselves: habits which transcend the prudence, justice, fortitude, and temperance of the philosophers, but which, by analogy, may assume the same names (Wis., 8). Some tend to unify these virtues (St. Augustine, De Moribus Ecclesie, 1, 25, 46), some to divide them into ever widening families (the ascetics, in general). We may finally refer to the noble explanation of moral virtue as a mean between two vicious extremes.—C.E.; Rickaby, Moral Philosophy, Lond., 1910; Ullathorne, Groundwork of the Christian Virtues, Lond., 1888.

Virtues, angels who compose the second choir of the second or intermediate order of angels. They are the agents whom God employs for the performance of stupendous works or extraordinary miracles. The name is derived from the Latin and retains the original sense, which indicates physical strength or courage rather than moral excellence. —O'Connell, The Holy Angels, N. Y., 1923.

Vishnu (Skt., from rish, all-pervader; worker), one of the minor sun-gods in the system of early Hindu religion who later gave his name to the most popular of the three great divisions of Brahminism (q.v.). He is characterized by his great love for man, for whose welfare he appears as a savior in numerous reincarnations (avatara), in either human or animal form. His cult emerged from Brahminism in the 5th or 4th century B.C., but did not assume a sectarian form until after the 7th century of the Christian era. To compete with the religion of the Mohammedan conquerors of India in the 11th century the cult was popularized by various liturgical practises in consequence of which it lends itself to the grossest immorality, while at the same time it is capable of producing a beautiful and refined asceticism among many of its followers.

Visibility of the Church. The question of the visibility of the Church of Christ lies at the root of all the controversies between the Catholic Church and Protestantism. For if we retain the Catholic notion of the visible Church, it follows that the whole defection of the 16th century, and all the sects which have arisen from that time on, are nothing more nor less than revolts against the definitely visible Church of Christ. In general, the Protestant opinion concerning this matter is that the true Church of Christ, to which alone the Divine promises were made, exists in an invisible form only; and that a visible form is not of the essence of the Church, or of the promises made to the Church. They believe that the Church of Christ exists only in its sanctified members, or in its predestined members. These members are not formed and generated by the Church through any divinely instituted ministry; but rather are they formed or generated immediately by God. This immediate union of individuals with Christ, through faith (which eliminates the necessity of the ministry of the Church), constitutes the true essence of the
The intellectual vision takes place in the pure understanding, and not in the reasoning faculty. The three kinds do not exclude each other, but are often found together. Visions are not always and of necessity connected with ecstasies, raptures and simple contemplation. By reason of their dignity or excellence the intellectual vision holds first place, and that of the imagination is superior to the bodily vision. Spiritual guides and teachers advise that individuals should not desire or seek after visions lest they be deceived.—C.E.; Devine, A Manual of Mystical Theology, N. Y., 1903.

Visitation, Canonical, an official examination by ecclesiastical superiors of persons, institutions, or territories, in regard to matters of faith, morals, or church discipline. The bishop is obliged to visit his entire diocese annually either entirely or in part, but so that the whole territory is covered every five years. If legitimately impeded, he may send his Vicar-General or another visitor. Should he neglect the visitation, the archbishop is authorized by law to conduct it, the Holy See having previously been notified. All persons, goods and pious institutions within the diocesan confines are subject to episcopal visitation, unless it can be proved that the law or the Apostolic See has granted a special exemption. The visitor should proceed in a paternal manner in things pertaining to the object and purpose of the visitation. Unnecessary prolongations are to be avoided. Local custom determines the mode of defraying the visitor’s expenses. The major superiors of religious must conduct a canonical visitation in accordance with the prescriptions of their constitutions.—C.E.; Augustine, Rights and Duties of Ordinaries, St. L., 1924. (s. B.)

Visitation of the Blessed Virgin Mary, a feast which commemorates the visit of the Blessed Virgin to her cousin St. Elizabeth. At the sound of Mary's greeting the infant John was sanctified, cleansed from original sin, in his mother's womb; Elizabeth was filled with the Holy Spirit and declared Mary the Mother of God, and "blessed among women." Mary, under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost sang the Magnificat: My soul doth magnify the Lord. The feast of the Visitation of the Blessed Virgin Mary was first celebrated by the Franciscans, 1263. It was extended to the entire Church by Boniface IX, 1390. Among the many masters who have represented this subject in art are: Albertini, Bernini, Botticelli, della Robbia, Echave the Elder, Ghirlandajo, Master of the Life of Mary, Mignard, Müller, Pachiarotto, Palma, Pinturicchio, Piombo, and Titian.—C.E. (N. M. W.)

Visitors, Apostolic, ecclesiastics deputed by the pope to inspect dioceses and religious orders; also those appointed to make the episcopal visitation of the diocese of Rome. The late Card. Bonzano, when Apostolic delegate, was appointed, 14 June, 1922, to visit dioceses and churches of United States.—C.E.

Visits to the Blessed Sacrament, time spent in prayer before Christ as He is present in the consecrated Species reserved in the Tabernacle. This devotion aims principally to honor Him as a Sovereign dwelling amongst His people. Although there is no clear evidence of this custom before the 10th century, no doubt it was always practised, especially in the early days of the Church when the faithful kept the Blessed Sacrament in their homes.—C.E.

Vitalian, Saint, Pope (657-672), b. Segni, Italy. d. Rome. During his pontificate he succeeded in asserting the primacy of Rome against the plans of Emperor Constans II; opposed Monothelitism, and attempted in vain to convert Emperor Constantine IV to orthodoxy; secured unity for the English Church, which was divided on various ecclesiastical customs; and appointed Theodore of Tarsus Abp. of Canterbury.—C.E.; Mann.

Vitalis, Saint, martyr (171), d. Ravenna, Italy. He was the father of Sts. Gervasius and Protasius. Having encouraged St. Ursicinus, who was waver­ing at the prospect of death, and having buried his remains, Vitalis was sentenced to martyrdom by the judge Paulinus, tortured, and burned alive. Patron of Ravenna. Relics in church of St. Vitalis, Ravenna. Feast, R. Cal., 28 Apr.—C.E.; Butler.

Vitalis and Agricola, Saints, martyrs (c. 304), d. Bologna. Agricola was a wealthy nobleman of Bologna. Having embraced Christianity, he converted his slave Vitalis, who was put to death before his master’s eyes. Agricola refused to apostatize and was crucified. They were buried in the Jewish cemetery, where St. Ambrose discovered them, 393. Relics at St. Stephen’s, Florence. Feast, R. Cal., 4 Nov.—C.E.; Butler.

Vitalism (Lat., vita, life), the doctrine that among the corporeal things to be found in the universe some are endowed with a power of self-motion or life, possess something not within the range of mechanics, chemistry, or of physics, i.e., call it “soul,” “vital principle,” “entelechy,” that makes them essentially different from what are commonly called non-living things. This view is that of common-sense and traditional Catholic philosophy, taught by Aristotle and Plato among Greek philosophers, by the Schoolmen in the Middle Ages, and by a fairly general denial in the last century due to the wide-spread materialism and mechanism; then rampant, is steadily gaining ground among right-thinking scientists and philosophers. The arguments for Vitalism are taken from the wonderful unity of operation and purposive striving, power of self-adaptation, protective reaction, regeneration, and propagation displayed by living things as opposed to non-living things.—Windle, Vitalism and Scholasticism, St. L., 1920. (J. R.)

Vitus, Modestus, and Crescentia, Saints, martyrs (c. 303), d. Lucania, Italy. According to legend, Vitus was the seven-year-old son of a pagan senator of Sicily. Modestus and his wife Crescentia, the boy’s tutor and his nurse, instructed him in the tenets of the Faith, incurring the wrath of their master, who was opposed to Christianity. The three took refuge in Italy, but were discovered at Lucania. They were taken to Rome and subjected to torture. An angel brought the martyrs back to Lucania, where they died of their wounds. St. Vitus is invoked against epilepsy and nervousness, as one of the Fourteen Holy Helpers (q.v.). He is represented near a kettle of boiling oil. Relics of St. Vitus at Prague, and Corvey in Westphalia. Feast, R. Cal., 15 June.—C.E.; Butler.

Viva, Domenico (1648-1726), theological writer, b. Lecce, Italy. He entered the Society of Jesus, 1633, and taught the humanities and Greek, nine years’ philosophy, eight years’ moral theology, and eight years’ Scholastic theology. For two years he was prefect of studies, rector of the College of Naples, 1711, and provincial of Naples. Fr. Viva’s writings include “Enchiridion,” a work concerning indulgences; a course of theology compiled from his lectures at Naples; “Opuscula theologico-moralia”; and “Trutina theologica damnatarum the­sauri.”

Vivisection, the dissection of living beings. As commonly used, the term includes all scientific experiments performed on living animals for the purpose of advancing medical knowledge. The use of animals for this purpose is entirely in keeping with the dictates of morality and reason, provided that all unnecessary cruelty is avoided. Assuming that animals are not on a level of equality with man, it follows that they may be used to serve the needs and convenience of man. Experiments on living animals have greatly increased the knowledge of the causes and remedies of disease. To forbid such experiments would seriously handicap scientific research and deprive humanity of great physical benefits in the future.—C.E.; Koch-Freund.

Vizagapatam, Diocese of, India; comprises all the districts north of the Godavery River; part of the Central Provinces, and part of Behar and Orissa; area, 62,567 sq. m.; suffragan of Madras; diocese, 1886. Bishops: John M. Tissot (1886-90); John M. Clerc (1901-1926); Peter Rosillon, M.S.F.S. (1929). Churches, 16; chapels, 62; priests, 42; religious women, secular, 4; priests, regular, 40; religious women, 73; high schools, 2; elementary schools, 82; pupils in latter, 3902; institutions, 14; Catholics, 11,309.

Vladimir (Voledomir), Saint, called “the Great” (956-1015), Grand Duke of Kiev and all Russia, d. Berestova. He was the first Christian ruler of Russia. In his wars with his brother he reconquered Novgorod and Kiev, and made himself ruler of Kiev and all Russia, 980. He subdued the Chervens cities; in 983 overcame the Yatviags, and, 985, fought the Bulgarians; and in an campaign against the Eastern Empire, became interested in Christianity. In order to marry Anna, the sister of Emperor Basil II, he was baptized, gave up his warlike career, and devoted himself to the conversion of his subjects, the establishment of schools, churches, and ecclesiastical courts.—C.E.

Vocation, God’s call to a special state of life, regards practically the priesthood, or life in a religious Order, or both; and may be considered on the part of God calling; or of the one called. The former may be the general invitation inducing no obligation: "If you will be perfect, come, follow me." It may be the particular invitation of grace suggesting, inclining, moving, which usually specifies the term, but does not strictly oblige; or the obligatory call specifying absolutely the terms, such as the Apostles and many saints received. The one called responds by offering himself to those whose function it is to receive or to reject. But the offering, however it obliges him, imposes none on them. Interior attractions, however unmistakable, give no title to the priesthood or to religion. For him the formal vocation is the summons of the bishop to major orders, or of the religious superior to profession. This was determined under Pius X. One might foresee in this doctrine grave difficulties. Its very object was to remove those induced by the notion that the director's guarantee of an interior call gave a title to the priesthood or to religion. For the other hand, the giving grace its adequate function in the candidate's future, the conditions of acceptance are so simplified that, abstracting from those purely physical, health, etc., the candidate with due interior dispositions rarely fails to satisfy them. As regards the various orders, only the superiors knowing their requirements can judge vocations to each.—C.E.; Damand, Choice of a State of Life, Dublin, 1880.

Voce Del Popolo, in Italian and English in Detroit, Mich., by the Italian Publishing Co.; founded, 1910; circulation, 10,000.

Volta, Alessandro (1745-1827), physicist, b. d. there. Professor of natural philosophy at Padua and later director of the philosophical faculty there, he invented the "condensing electroscope," the first practical electrophorus, and the voltaic "pile." The volt, the unit of electrical pressure, is named after him.—C.E.

Voltaire (Francois Marie Arouet; 1694-1778), philosopher, poet, and historian, b. Paris; d. there. He studied under the Jesuits. Immediately after leaving college he began an agitated life, attempted to ingratiate himself with the aristocracy, and to make a fortune by questionable means. He was imprisoned in the Bastille and exiled to England for three years. Forced to leave Paris shortly after his return, for 16 years he received the hospitality of Mme. du Châtelet at Cirey. After her death he accepted the invitation of Frederick II of Prussia and stayed three years at Berlin. Having incurred the king's displeasure, he was forced to leave and settled at Ferney near Geneva where he led an independent life. He spent 20 years there as "The Patriarch of Ferney," and intellectual king of Europe, and returned to Paris only to die after a triumphal reception. He was buried in a monastery, and in 1791 his body was placed in the Panthéon. He was the most versatile writer France ever produced, although it would be an abuse of language to speak of his "genius." As an epic poet ("La Henriade") he is negligible; as a playwright he wrote tragedies in imitation of Shakespeare, the best known of which are "Zaire" and "Mérope"; as a light poet he is highly entertaining; as a satirist he often indulges in personalities and his buffoonery often gets tiresome. In philosophy he is a deist and an epicurean and his "Dictionnaire Philosophique" treats the most serious subjects with questionable levity. His immense correspondence (10,000 letters) is the most interesting part of his literary output and constitutes his history of his time. As a character he was despicable; unpatriotic, cowardly, a shameless liar, irreligious to the core; he has done incalculable harm and the "Voltairean Spirit" which mocks all things sacred is still abroad in the world. As a writer, no one ever surpassed him in clearness, directness, and naturalism.—(F. P. B.)

Volta Lower, Vicariate Apostolic of, Gold Coast, West Africa (British possession); established, 1923; entrusted to the African Missions of Lyons. Vicar Apostolic: Augustine Hermann (1923), residence at Keta. Churches, 3; stations, principal, 5; stations, secondary, 76; catechumens, 3240; schools, 62; pupils, 2700; Catholics, 12,025.

Voluntary (Lat., voluntarius), in the strict sense an act which proceeds from the will in the light of intelligence. It is not necessarily a free act. The general tendency of our nature towards happiness is a fixed bent of our nature. We cannot really wish to be miserable. Yet this tendency is rightly called voluntary, for it proceeds from the will and is approved by the will in the light of intelligence. Apart from this case voluntary acts are also free. Consequently voluntary is commonly taken in a less strict sense as synonymous with human.—C.E.

Volunteers of America, a religious society organized in the spring of 1896 by Mr. and Mrs. Ballington Booth, "for the uplifting of the unchurched and the needy." They are in agreement on all essential points with the evangelical churches. The Book of Rules contains a statement of their principles, and they observe the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper. Democratic in government, the term military "is applied only in the bestowing of titles, the wearing of uniforms, and the movement of troops." The Volunteer Union League Branch organized by, and under the personal supervision of Mrs. Booth, carries on its work in city and Federal prisons. In 1926 in the United States there were 133 churches, and 28,756 members.

Völuspá, "the wisdom of the Prophets," famous Norse mythological poem relating in the form of a vision the beginning and end of all things and telling of the gods and their doom. It is one of our chief sources of ancient cosmogony. This poem, which probably originated in Iceland, cannot be dated farther back than the middle of the 10th century. Although the subject-matter is prevailingly pagan, the point of view has assumed a Christian coloring and there are unoubted Christian reminiscences. The "Völuspá" gives an account of the creation of the universe which has been subject to much foreign influence.—C.E.
Voodooism (Creole Fr., vaudou, a Negro sorcerer), term applied to the base superstitions and magical practices in use among the Negroes in certain parts of Africa, the West Indies, and the southern United States. It had its origin in African fetishism.

Votive Candles, candles burned before some statue or shrine to give honor to Our Lord or to a saint. The word votive signifies that the lighting is often done in fulfillment of a vow. They are usually not blessed, and in that case they are not presented to the shrine of the saint through whose intercession the favor has been obtained.—C.E.

Votive Mass. (1) Mass offered for a special intention not corresponding to the Office of the day on which it is celebrated. (2) Strict votive Masses: those ordered by the rubrics of the Missal, e.g., de B.V.M. in Sabbata; or by the bishop for a serious cause (pro re graevi), e.g., for the election of a bishop, the birth of a child, etc.; that said directly from the Forty Hours' Devotion. (3) Those said by the priest at his own discretion. These are permitted on a semi-double, simple, or feria, except on Sunday, Ash Wednesday, the eve of Christmas, Epiphany, Pentecost and during the octaves of Epiphany, Easter, Pentecost, and Corpus Christi, or during Holy Week, and on All Souls' Day. These Masses may be taken from any of those in the missal.—C.E.; Wuest, tr. Mullaney, Matters Liturgical, N.Y., 1926.

Votive Offerings, things vowed or dedicated to God or a saint in some trouble or crisis of life or presented in gratitude for a recovery or deliverance without having been previously promised. They are presented to the shrine of the saint through whose intercession the favor has been obtained.—C.E.

Vow, impedance of. See CHASTITY, Vow of.

Vows, in scripture. A vow is a promise made freely to consecrate oneself or some possession to God (Lev., 27). Things which by right were already consecrated to God normally, were excluded, as for instance a victim which did not fulfill the proper conditions (Lev., 22; Mal., 1), or money coming from persons consecrated to the service of Astarte, goddess of fecundity, the so-called hierodouloi (temple-courtiers) (Deut., 23). Vows could be made only by dependents, such as an unmarried daughter, or a married woman, with the consent of the head of the family; hence the vows of such persons, to be valid, had to be ratified by the father or husband; and these were taken to have ratified the vow, if, on hearing it, they raised no objection (Num., 30). A vow is binding in conscience and must be fulfilled exactly as promised and without undue delay. Since in making a vow one assumes an obligation of one's own free will, it were better not to make a vow than to make one and break it (Eccles., 5). A special class of vows are those by which a person binds himself to refrain from certain things; thus the vow of the Nazarites described in detail in Numbers, 6. The vow was temporary, assumed for 30 days at least, or might be lifetime. It implied abstinence from wine or intoxicating drinks, allowing the hair of the head to grow, and scrupulous avoidance of all legal uncleanness (Judges, 13 and 16).—C.E.

Vox Populi (Lat., voice of the people. (1) Public sentiment, public feeling as manifested by a ballot, etc. (2) Vox populi vox Dei, "the voice of the people is the voice of God." (a) The manifestation of the public will is the manifestation of God's will inasmuch as the power given to those in authority by God is placed in certain persons by the voice of God; (b) the voice of the people is irresistible, cannot be denied. (C. J. D.)

V. Rev. = Very Reverend.

V.T. = Vetus Testamentum (Old Testament).

Vulgate (Lat., vulgata, common). The Latin translation of the Bible, which is chiefly the work of St. Jerome, received this name from St. Jerome's Vulgate to the Benedictines. So far the translation of the Bible, which is chiefly the work of St. Jerome, received this name from St. Jerome's Vulgate to the Benedictines. So far the Vulgate contains the following parts: (a) the protocanonical books of the O.T., except the Psalms, translated by St. Jerome directly from the Hebrew; (b) the Psalms, taken from the Old Latin but revised by St. Jerome according to Origen's revision of the Septuagint; (c) the deuterocanonical books of Tobit and Judith translated by St. Jerome from the Aramaic; (d) the deuterocanonical parts of Daniel and Esther, translated by St. Jerome from the Greek; (e) the other deuterocanonical books, taken from the Old Latin but not revised by St. Jerome; (f) the N.T., taken from the Old Latin but revised by St. Jerome. The Vulgate is a faithful and most valuable translation, done in idiomatic, clear Latin. At first it met opposition but gradually it came into general use. Later numerous variants and corruptions appeared in the text which was repeatedly revised during the Middle Ages. In the 15th and 16th centuries several hundred editions of the Vulgate were printed with innumerable variants. To establish uniformity the Council of Trent, 1546, declared the Vulgate "is to be held authentic in public readings, disputations, preachings and expositions" (Sess. IV) and ordered its careful revision. This decree declares the Vulgate to be the official text of the Church and valid proof, consequently also free from substantial error in faith and morals. The Vulgate was revised under Sixtus V, 1586, and again under Clement VIII, 1592. The latter revision is the official text of the Church. Since it is not free from textual mistakes, Pius X, 1907, entrusted the systematic restoration of Jerome's Vulgate to the Benedictines. So far the revision of Genesis and Exodus with a complete critical apparatus, have been published.—C.E., X, 370, 515; Gigot; Grannan.

Vulture (Lat., velare, to pluck), a large bird of prey found in the warmer climates of both the Old and the New World. It is mentioned in the Bible, where it typifies greed (Lev., 11; Deut., 14; Job, 28).

Vytis, a semi-monthly Catholic magazine published in Lithuanian and English in Chicago, Ill., by the Knights of Lithuania; founded, 1915; circulation, 2500.
Wadding, Luke (1588-1657), historian and theologian, b. Waterford, Ireland; d. Rome. Entering the Friars Minor, he was ordained, 1613. Fr. Wadding held a professorship until 1618, when he was chosen theologian of the embassy which Philip III was sending to Paul V to promote the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception. He founded the Irish Franciscan College of St. Isidore, 1625, and the Ludovisian College for Irish secular priests. It is due to Wadding's influence as member of the commission for the reform of the Breviary, that the feast of St. Patrick was inserted in the calendar of the Universal Church. He brought about the endowment of an institution for the Irish secular clergy, and founded another house at Capranica as a novitiate for St. Isidore's. Wadding's literary fame rests on the publication of the writings and the recording of the deeds of the illustrious members of his order, and chiefly on his "Annales ord. minorum."—C.E.

Wagga-Wagga, Diocese of, New South Wales, Australia, established, 1917, by separation from the Diocese of Goulburn; suffragan of Sydney. Bishop: Joseph Wilfrid Dwyer (1918). Churches, 59; but it was probably founded by Dunawd in the 6th century and was also erected in the 6th century by St. David, the patron of Wales, and probably the most illustrious of the ancient British bishops. St. Kentigern created the diocese of St. Asaph at this time. Later nothing definite is known of the foundation of the Welsh Abbey of Bangor. Llandaff, the oldest episcopal see in Wales, was created the diocese of St. Asaph at this time. Later

Wailing Wall, or Solomon's Wall. A wall in Jerusalem, 40 yds. long, all that remains of the Temple. Since the 12th century the Arabs have permitted the Jews to assemble there to pray and lament, especially on the eve of the Sabbath and of feasts. The recent bloody clashes between Arabs and Jews in the Holy City and its environs began with a dispute over this wall. These late tragic occurrences have recalled the numerous indignities which Catholics have suffered at the hands of Orthodox Greeks and Moslems in the Holy Land.

Waldenses, a sect which began in the 12th century. Its name is derived from Peter Waldo (Waldes) who, after a reading of the Gospels, aspired to the life of Christian perfection and took a vow of poverty, 1176. He gathered numerous followers who went about preaching his doctrines, and attacking the pomp and wealth of the medieval Church. Their break with Catholicity was gradual, but, 1184, they were denounced by papal authority. Their organization has continued to the present time, though after the rise of modern Protestantism they came under Calvinistic influence and are now scarcely to be distinguished from other Protestants. They exist principally in Italy, France, Spain, and Switzerland, though a few congregations have been formed, mostly by immigration, in North and South America.—C.E. (V. K.)

Waldseemüller (Hellenized Isacomilus), Martin (c. 1475-c. 1522), map-maker, b. Wolfenweiler, Fribourg; d. St. Die, Lorraine. He used the name America in his great map of the world, 1507, and again in a small globe with a text "Cosmographie introductio" in which he justifies the name by a Latin translation of the four journeys of Amerigo Vespucci. His new Latin edition of the geography of Ptolemy to which he added 20 new maps, is often regarded as the "first modern atlas of the world."—C.E.

Wales, mountainous country in the western part of Great Britain; area, 7,466 sq. m.; pop., 2,205,680. Christianity was the prevalent religion of Wales at the end of the Roman occupation, and the Welsh clergy were in frequent communication with Rome. Llandaff, the oldest episcopal see in Wales, was founded in the 6th century and Sts. Dubricius and Tello were its bishops. The Diocese of St. David's was also erected in the 6th century by St. David, the patron of Wales, and probably the most illustrious of the ancient British bishops. St. Kentigern created the diocese of St. Asaph at this time. Later it was divided between the dioceses of Chester, Bangor, and St. Asaph; St. Asaph, Flintshire. Nothing definite is known of the foundation of the Welsh Abbey of Bangor but it was probably founded by Dunawd in the 6th century and was the greatest monastic establishment in Wales, having at one time 2000 monks. After the conquest the archbishops of Canterbury exercised their jurisdiction over Wales and St. Asaph placed Bp. Beaufort of Llandaff under interdict. Beaufort's successor, Urban, was consecrated at Canterbury and from that time Llandaff became a suffragan see of Canterbury. At the time of the establishment of the four vicariates Apostolic in England (1688), Wales belonged to the Vicariate of the Western District. In 1840 it was made a separate vicariate by Pope Gregory XVI; in 1850 the Catholic hierarchy was reestablished in England, and Wales was added to the diocese of Shrewsbury and Newport. In 1895, the principality with the exception of Glamorganshire was again formed into a separate vicariate Apostolic under Rt. Rev. Francis Joseph Mostyn. In 1898 he was transferred to Menevia when the vicariate was made a diocese by Leo XIII. By letters Apostolic, 1911, Pope Pius X divided England and Wales which from 1850 had only one province, into the three Provinces of Westminster, Birmingham, and Liverpool. On 7 Feb., 1916, a fourth province of Cardiff, formerly known as the diocese of Newport, in Wales, was added. Today the majority of the people are Calvinistic Methodists, and Anglicans. Since 1920 when the Welsh Church Act completed the disestablishment of the Anglican Church in Wales, it has been a separate archdiocese. Place-names of Catholic interest are: Bishopston, Swansea; Holyhead, Anglesey; Holywell, Flintshire; St. Asaph, Flintshire; St. Athan, Cardiff; St. Bride's Major, Bridgend, Glamorgan; St. Bride's-super-Ely, Cardiff; St. Clears, Carmarthen; St. David's, Haverfordwest, Pembrokeshire; St. Fagan's, Cardiff; St. George-super-Ely, Cardiff; St. Hilary, Cardiff; St. Ishmael's, Milford Haven, Pembrokeshire; St. Melyn, Cardiff; and St. Nicholas, Cardiff. In 1929 Wales included the Archdiocese of Cardiff and its suffragan, the Diocese of Menevia (qq.v.). Churches, 105; secular priests, 82; regular priests, 114; high schools, 5; primary schools, 52; charitable institutions, 9; Catholics, 89,784.—C.E.

Wallon, Henri Alexandre (1812-1904), historian and statesman, b. Valenciennes, France; d. Paris. He was professor of history at the Sorbonne and dean of the Paris faculty of letters, and also deputy, 1871. As minister of public instruction, he favored liberty of higher education and as senator for life, always defended Catholic interests in the Senate.—C.E.; Suppl., 42.

Walsh, Robert (1755-1839), lawyer and diplomat, b. Baltimore; d. Paris. He was founder of the American Review of History and Politics, the first American quarterly, edited the National Gazette, and was author of "Dadaetics," a collection of essays. He was Consul General for the United States in Paris, 1837-44.—C.E.

Walsingham Priory, a monastery founded in the 11th century in northern Norfolk, England, once the seat of a shrine of Our Lady confirmed by the Pope in 1141 in a bull of Pope Eugenius III. Thereafter pilgrims came annually. In 1538 the shrine was dismantled, the priory destroyed, and the site sold, a private home later being built there.—C.E.

Walter of Merton (d. 1277), Bp. of Rochester and founder of Merton College, Oxford, b. probably at Merton. In 1261 he set aside two manors in Surrey for the priory at Merton, for the support of "scholars residing at the schools"; in 1264 he drew up statutes for a "house of scholars of Merton"; and 10 years later these scholars were transferred to Oxford and a permanent house established. He was chancellor, 1272.—C.E.

Walter Pierson, Blessed, martyr (1537), d. Newgate, London. He was a Carthusian lay brother of the London Charterhouse. Refusing to take the Oath of Supremacy, he was imprisoned and starved to death. Beatedified, 1888.

Waltham Holy Cross Abbey, Essex, England. The church was built by one Tofig, a wealthy landowner. In 1060, Harold enlarged it, establishing a college of secular canons; these were displaced, 1177, by Augustinian Canons. Under Walter de Gant, abbot, it became the most important Augustinian house in the country. It was the last to surrender at the Dissolution, 1540. Today it is a place of worship for Anglicans, C.E.

Wandering Jew, the, according to legend, the cobbler Ahasuerus, who refused to let Jesus rest by his threshold on the way to Calvary, whereupon Our Lord replied: "I shall stand here and rest, but thou shalt go on until the last day." Since then the Jew has been roaming restless over the earth. According to the version of an Armenian bishop who visited England, 1228, the Jew was the door-keeper of Pilate, whom Jesus condemned to stay until He came. The repentant offender, now leading a saintly life, was never able to die, but was restored after every century to the age of 30. The first literary record of such a wanderer is in the "Flores Historiarum" by a monk of St. Albans, and is also incorporated in the "Historia Major" of Matthew Paris. Whatever the origin of the tale, the legend owes its popularity to the chap-books appearing in 1602. In the English chronicles the Jew is called Cartaphilus; in the Italian, Bottadio; in the Belgian, Laquedim; in the Spanish, Juan-Dios. The best French version is the "Histoire admirable d'un Juif Errant," of the 17th century. E. Sue's book of this name is a typical anti-Jesuit 19th-century novel, now cut out of fashion.—C.E., IX, 120.

Ward, Artemus. See Browne, Charles Frazier.

Ward, James Harman (1806-61), commander U. S. Navy, b. Hartford, Conn.; d. Matthias Point, Va. He assisted in the founding of the U. S. Naval Academy at Annapolis, 1845; was a civilian examiner of the U. S. Navy, 1847; master of a naval school, 1852; was second in command of the Potomac flotilla, he was killed in attack. A convert, he was first Union naval officer to fall in the Civil War.—C.E.

Ward, William George (1812-82), writer and convert, b. London; d. there. A staunch defender of Newman in the Tractarian movement, he advocated the gradual assimilation of Catholic doctrine by the Established Church, but realizing the futility of this, entered the Church. As editor of the Dublin Review he defended papal authority and was founder and president of the Metaphysical Society.—C.E.; Ward, William George Ward and the Catholic Revival, N. Y., 1912.

Ward's Errata of the Protestant Bible, a collection of the mistranslations put into the early Protestant Bibles to promote the Reformation in England, compiled in 1688 by Thomas Ward. It contrasts Catholic and Protestant versions by arranging them in four columns. In the two left columns are the Latin and Rheims versions, and in the right, versions used in Queen Elizabeth's time, and the King James. Everywhere that the King James version corrected Elizabethan versions, Ward wrote in the fourth column "Corrected." The "Errata" was violently denounced, but it was defended by Milner, and also by Lingard in his celebrated edition of the Bible, issued in 1810. In passages where "idols" were forbidden, Protestant versions substituted "images," to make it appear that representations of Christ and His saints were forbidden. Such texts as "How agreeth the temple of God with images?" (2 Cor., 6), caused statues and windows to be smashed, and the cross to be torn down from the churches; such passages are marked "Corrected." Ward's notes make clear the less evident errata, e.g., against the Real Presence. To represent Christ as so contained in heaven that He cannot be also on the altar, St. Peter's words, "Jesus Christ. Whom heaven must receive" (Acts, 3), were rendered: "Whom heaven must contain." The Anglican Bishops' Bible, 1669, added in the margin: "We therefore believe constantly that he is in none other place" ("Corrected"). Many mistranslations retained by the King James have been corrected in the Revised and modern versions, e.g., Bishops' Bible: "assurance of faith" (Heb., 10); Revised: "fulness of faith"; King James: "whosoever shall eat this bread, and drink this cup" (1 Cor., 11); Revised: "or drink"; King James: "All men cannot receive this saying" (Matt., 19); Allen (Int. Crit. Com.): "All do not"; King James: "Marriage is honorable in all" (Heb., 13); Revised: "Let marriage be..." Ward rightly censures the substitution of "wife" for "woman" in 1 Cor., 9, 5; but the King James which had "wife" in the text should be credited with putting "or woman" in the margin. Editions of 1611 and 1729 had "or woman." Ward made some mistakes; all that he considered errors were not. An edition was printed in New York, 1896.

Warham, William (c. 1450-1532), Abp. of Canterbury, b. Church Oakley, Hampshire, England; d. Hackington, near Canterbury. He was often sent on foreign embassies, was made Keeper of the Great Seal, and, 1504, Chancellor of England. He crowned Henry VIII, offended him in his divorce suit, and, after the downfall of Wolsey, proposed to recognize Henry as head of the Church. In 1532 he realized his mistake and protested against his former action.—C.E.

Washing of the Feet. It was customary in ancient eastern countries to wash the feet of the guest coming in from the dusty roads. Christ washed His Apostles' feet after the Last Supper. In some cathedrals and religious houses the bishop or superior, imitating Christ's example, washes the feet of 12 poor men on Holy Thursday as an act of humility and charity.—C.E. (J. C. T.)

Washing of the Hands. The priest washes his fingers before vesting for Mass and after the offering of the bread and wine, to cleanse the hands before handling the Body and Blood of Christ, and to symbolize the purity of conscience which the priest should possess. After the Communion, he purifies the thumbs and forefingers to remove particles of the Host per chance adhering to them. He drinks the water and wine used for this purification. Finally, he washes his fingers after unvesting.—C.E., IX, 44. (J. C. T.)

Washington, city, District of Columbia, and capital of the United States, Catholics have played an important part in the history of the city of Washington; after the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, when a permanent seat of the general government was being planned, Daniel Carroll "of Duddington" (brother of John Carroll, first bishop of the hierarchy of the United States) was chosen by the president as one of three commissioners who should lay out a site for the new federal city. The site he advocated was eventually chosen, and the capital was built on land which he had owned and transferred to the government; he was also one of the two official commissioners of Congress who laid the corner-stone of the District of Columbia, April, 1791. The credit of the design of the city is mainly due to Major Charles Pierre L'Enfant, and the competition held to choose a plan for the president's house was won by another Catholic, James Hoban, in accordance with whose plans the "White House" was therefore built. In 1882, when the city was incorporated and a city council elected by the people, the president appointed Robert Brent, a nephew of Bp. John Carroll, as the first mayor of Washington, which position he held for 10 years.

The history of Catholicity in the vicinity of the city is traced back to the earliest days of Lord Baltimore's Colony; in 1639 a mission was established at Kitamanquid, a few miles below Washington, by Father Andrew White, S.J., "the Apostle of Maryland," the first priest to visit this region; the prohibition of public exercise of Catholic worship in Maryland during the early part of the 18th century prevented the building of any churches, but when religious liberty was ensured by the independence of the United States a new era began for the Catholic Faith. The oldest Catholic church in the vicinity of the city is Holy Trinity, Georgetown, now used as a parochial school, and the oldest in the city itself is St. Patrick's, for which Father Anthony Caffrey obtained the land, 1794; the second pastor of St. Patrick's, Father John Carroll, was the first native-born American to be raised to the priesthood in the United States. There are now 34 Catholic churches, of which number six are for the use of colored people, 27 parochial schools, and three missions. The most important among the numerous Catholic educational institutions in Washington are: for men, the Catholic University of America, Georgetown University, Gonzaga College and High School, and St. John's College; for women, Trinity College, Convent of the Sacred Heart, Georgetown Visitation Convent, Holy Cross Academy, and the Sacred Heart Academy. There are also various Catholic orphanages, homes, and hospitals. Among the various statues in the city are those of the Count de Rochambeau, and of Christopher Columbus, the latter dedicated with a great civic celebration, 1912, by the Knights of Columbus. In 1893 the Apostolic Delegation for the United States was established, and Washington has since been the residence of the cardinals who have been the successive delegates from the Court of the Vatican.

Washington, the 19th state of the United States in size, the 30th in population, and the 42nd state to be admitted to the Union (11 Nov., 1889); area, 69,127 sq. m.; pop. (1920), 1,356,621; Catholics (1928), 120,067. The settlements established by the Hudson Bay Company during the first decades of the 19th century in the Oregon country, which then included Washington and western Canada as well as Oregon, were made up largely of Catholic Indians from the east and of French Canadians. Their repeated requests for missionaries were finally answered by Bp. Joseph Signay of Quebec, 1837, and the next year Fr. François Norbert Blanchet and Fr. Modeste Demers, of the Quebec Seminary, were sent by the government by boat and horseback to the west with agents of the fur company. After stops at Fort Colville, Okanogan, and Fort Walla Walla (now Wallula) they reached Fort Vancouver on the Columbia, and said Mass there in the little schoolhouse, 24 Nov., 1838. As the authorities desired them to settle north of the Columbia, within the limits of what was then English territory, they chose the Cowlitz valley for their permanent mission and Mass was first said in the home of Simon Plamondon of Cowlitz, the log chapel of St. Francis Xavier being completed, 1839. Here the missionaries first used their "Catholic Ladle," an ingenious device for teaching the Indians the history of Christianity. It consisted of a flat board on which cross-bars were used to represent divisions of time and leading events. In 1840 Fr. Blanchet journeyed to the Indians of Whity Island, in Puget Sound, where a log chapel was also built. For four years Fr. Demers did heroic missionary work among the Indians of Washington, going in 1843 to Oregon City. When Fr. de Smet brought missionaries from Belgium, 1844, to the Willamette valley in Oregon the zealous leader himself journeyed north through Washington, and founded the mission of St. Paul at Fort Colville. In 1847 the newly-appointed Bp. of Walla Walla, Augustin Magloire Blanchet, arrived at his seat with Rev. John Baptiste Brouillet and several Oblates. The latter, including Fr. Pansosy and Fr. Ricard, did valiant missionary work among the Indians of Puget Sound, where St. Joseph's Mission was established at Steilacoom, 1847, and among the Yakimas, where St. Rose's was founded by Fr. Caesarius Chonghe. On account of uprisings among the Cayuse Indians following their brutal murder of the Presbyterian minister, Dr. Whitman, of Wailatpu, 1847, Bp. Blanchet changed his residence to Fort Vancouver (Diocese of Nisqually), where his first cathedral, a log structure, was built and named in honor of St. James. Included in the state are the Dioceses of Seattle and Spokane (qq.v.); Catholic influence on place-names of the state is shown in the following: Priest Rapids, St. Andrews, St. Helen, St. John, and Trinidad. The U. S. Religious Census of 1916 gave the following statistics for church membership in Washington:

- Catholic Church: 97,418
- Methodist Episcopal Church: 49,059
- Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A: 28,435
- Northern Baptist Convention: 17,733
- Disciples of Christ: 17,533
- Congregational Churches: 10,215
- Protestant Episcopal Church: 10,681
- Lutheran Joint Synod of Ohio: 4,041
- Seventh-Day Adventists: 3,944
- Lutheran Norwegian Synod: 5,723
- Lutheran General Council: 3,609
- Jewish Congregations: 2,950
- Lutheran Social Conference: 2,744
- Lutheran United Norwegian Church: 2,744
- Unitarians: 2,176
- United Presbyterian Church: 2,124

All Other Denominations: 27,066
Total Church Membership: 288,799

Comprises Waterford and parts of Tipperary and Cork; suffragan of Cashel. In 630 St. Carthage established a school at Lismore, where it is supposed four early abbots had preceded him, Episcopalian jurisdiction of the diocese which developed there was defined at the Synod of Rathbreasil, 1110. Malchus was first bishop of Waterford (1096-1110). His noted successors included David the Welshman (d. 1207), Robert (1210-22), Roger Cradock (1550-62), and 23 bishops. The dioceses were united, 1362, the list of bishops including Nicholas Comin and Patrick Walshe in the 16th century, Sylvester Lord (1739-48), William Egan (1774-96), Thomas Hussey (1797-1803), Richard Sheehan (1892-1916), and Bernard Hackett (1917); residence at Waterford. The cathedral of Lismore has been Protestant since the Reformation; the Protestant cathedral of Waterford occupies the site of the old Danish church (1096). Churches, 77; priests, 167; religious women, 594; seminaries, 2; colleges, 3; high schools, 16; numerous primary schools; institutions, 25; Catholics, 113,002.

Waverly Abbey, Surrey, England, second daughter of L'Aumône, Normandy and the first Order of Cîteaux monastery in England, founded, 1124, by William Gifford, Bp. of Winchester. New buildings were erected, 1231. It was canonized, 1536, by Henry VIII.—C.E.

Way, Truth and Life, In John, 14, Christ declares Himself to be the Way, the Truth and the Life. The meaning of the term “the way” is explained by the statement that no one goes to the Father except through Him: He is not only men’s guide and example on their way to heaven, but something more. They go to the Father in virtue of their union with Him, who has atoned for their sins. He gives them access to God. Our Lord calls Himself “the Truth” and “the Life” inasmuch as He possesses them absolutely, as does the Father. He is “the Truth” because in order to see the Father as He is He must look through Jesus (John, 1 and 6), and to give true witness which He gives, one must be in His bosom and partake of His nature, which... is truth and light (John, 1). He is "the Life" because from all eternity life was in Him (John, 1); as God-man He is life and a source of life (John, 11), being the living bread (John, 6), which gives everlasting life. Archbishop MacRory (The Gospel of St. John) and other commentators think that the words "the Truth and the Life" are added to explain how Christ is "the Way," namely inasmuch as He is the Truth and the Life. (W. S. K.)

Way of the Cross, a devotion performed by meditating, before 14 Stations of the Cross successively, on the Passion of Our Lord. The Stations are wooden crosses, usually affixed to the interior walls of a church, though they may be in the open air; the pictures, or groups of statuary, representing the journey of the Saviour to Calvary, are not the Stations; they are merely an aid to devotion. The Stations must be lawfully erected; that is, they must be blessed by the bishop of the diocese, or by a priest delegated by one having authority to do so. Otherwise no indulgence can be gained. During many centuries pious Christians went as pilgrims to Jerusalem; but when that city was captured by the fanatical Moslems the pilgrimages ceased. In various parts of Europe the custom arose of placing pictures in churches, representing the journey to Calvary. Probably the first to do this was the Blessed Alvarez, a Dominican, at Cordova, in Spain. The Franciscan Minorites adopted the practise in Italy, c. 1350, and for a long time the Franciscan Fathers were the only ones who could lawfully erect Stations in churches.

The Stations are 14 in number, although in past centuries, in different places, the number varied from 11 to 16. They may begin on either side of the church, according to the way in which the figure of Our Lord is facing. Some of the scenes shown in the pictures are described in the Gospels; others are not. There is no mention in the Scriptures of the Sunday is called Dominica, Lord's Day, in commemoration of Christ's Resurrection; Monday to Thursday to St. Joseph, Friday to the Passion, and Saturday to St. John.

Wedding Garment, title of the parable of Christ about the marriage of the king's son (Matt., 22). For one reason or other the guests invited remained away in spite of a repeated invitation. They even ill-treated and killed the servants sent to invite them. Their guests were urged to come from the highways and byways. One would imagine that a king so eager to get guests would have overlooked what they wore: on the other hand, one would expect that guests not ordinarily entitled to the honor of attending such banquets would conform to the proprieties and show their appreciation by dressing properly. One was found without a wedding garment and cast out, and the reminder that: "Many are called but few chosen" was repeated (Matt., 20). The Wedding Garment is sanctifying grace, the inspirations of which reach and affect the multitude, but effect the cooperation of comparatively few.—Fonck, tr. Leahy, Parables of the Gospel, N. Y., 1915.

Wedding-Ring, used in the ceremony of marriage, a symbol of faithfulness. At a marriage of Catholics it is blessed by the priest with a prayer and holy water, and is then placed by the man on the third finger of the woman's left hand, with the words, spoken by him: "With this ring I thee wed, and I plighted unto thee my troth." In other languages the words differ. In French they are: "Mon espouse, je te donne ce anneau en signe de mariage." There is no provision in the Church's ritual for the "double-ring service," which is a Protestant innovation. (J. F. S.)

Wednesday (Anglo-Saxon god, Woden), day of the week consecrated by the Church for devotion to St. Joseph.

Week, days of, as designated by the Church. Sunday is called Dominica, Lord's Day, in commemoration of Christ's Resurrection; Monday to Friday are counted from Sunday, the first day of the week, and called Feria Secunda, Feria Tertia, i.e., Second Day, Third Day. Saturday is called Sabbatum, a day of rest. The Church has adopted this usage from the Jews, who frequently counted the days from the Sabbath, as prima Sab- bati, the first day from the Sabbath (Mark, 16). Only the Portuguese adopted this style of naming the week-days. Tuesday is devoted to the Angels, Wednesday to St. Joseph, Thursday to the Blessed Sacrament, Friday to the Passion, and Saturday to the Blessed Virgin.

Weihaiwei, territory in the province of Shantung, China, leased by Great Britain, administered by a Commissioner; area, about 288 sq. m.; pop., 154,416. The religious history of this territory is included in that of China (q.v.). Ecclesiastically Weihaiwei belongs to the Vicariate Apostolic of Northern Honan (q.v.) and is the residence of the vicarate.

Weld, Thomas (1750-1819), benefactor, d. Stonyhurst. The scion of an ancient English family of Lulworth Castle, Dorset, remarkable for its loyalty to the Holy See, he succored the refugees of the French Revolution; assumed the entire support of the English Poor Clares; founded and maintained at Lulworth a monastery for the exiled Trappists of Melleray, Brittany (repatriated 1817); and gave the estate of Stonyhurst to the Jesuits. He had nine sons and six daughters.

—THOMAS (1773-1837), cardinal, son of preceding; b. London; d. Rome. He continued his father’s benefactions to religious establishments; after his wife’s death, became a priest, 1821, and kept an orphanage in London. He was consecrated coadjutor to the bishop of Kingston, Canada, 1820, but did not fill the appointment and resigned; created cardinal, 1850.

—FREDERICK ALOYSIUS (1823-91), K.C.M.G.; colonial administrator, grandson of Thomas, b. Chideock Manor, Dorset; d. there. Educated at Stonyhurst and Fribourg, he emigrated to New Zealand, 1843. As premier, 1864, he demanded home rule in colonial affairs, and subsequently was elected Governor of West Australia, 1869-75, Tasmania, 1875-80, Singapore and the Straits Settlements, 1880-87. He rendered especially distinguished service in developing the Malay Peninsula.—C.E.

Wellington, Archdiocese of, New Zealand; diocese, 1848; archdiocese, 1887; comprises the former provinces of Wellington, Taranaki, and Hawke’s Bay, in the North Island; and the larger portion of Nelson, together with Marlborough, in the South Island; suffragans: Auckland, Christchurch and Dunedin. Bishop: Philip Viard, S.M. (1860-72). Archbishop: Francis Redwood, S.M. (1874). Churches, 128; priests, secular, 58; priests, regulars, 64; religious women, 601; colleges, 2; boarding high schools, 17; primary schools, 61; pupils in Catholic schools, 10,854; institutions, 8; Catholics, 66,714 (including 2071 Maoris).

Wells in Scripture. In Palestine, owing to the scarcity of perennial rivers and the dryness of the soil as well as of the climate, particular attention has always been paid to the supply of fresh water. Besides the springs, and the extensive use of cisterns returned to London, 1738. Influenced by George volves the duty of fetching home the provision of Asaba. Churches and chapels, 144; stations, 310; Bedouin, gather to gossip and exchange the news while schools, 70; catechumens, 8688; pupils, 5790; in-

Wenceslaus (VACLAV), SAINT, martyr (903-935), Duke of Bohemia, b. and d. Alt-Bunzlau, Bohemia. He was a son of Duke Wratishlaw, a Christian, and Dragomir, a heathen, and was brought up by his grandmother, St. Ludmilla. After the death of his father the country became completely pagan under the regency of his mother. Wenceslaus assumed control, 928, made peace with Emperor Henry I, and restored the German priests and Christian influence. He was renowned for his virtues, having taken a vow of virginity. However, his mother had not lost hope of regaining control, and at her instigation Wenceslaus was killed by his brother Boleslaw. A famous carol, “Good King Wenceslaus,” tells a legend of him. Patron of Bohemia. Relics in church of St. Vitus, Prague, Feast, 28 Sept.—C.E.; Butler.

Wernersville, town, Pennsylvania, on the Reading Railroad, 8 m. w. of Reading, in the Lebanon Valley, named after its founder, William Werners, (1810-65). The population, about 1000, is mainly Dutch Reformed. Christ Church, with only five Catholics. One mile north, on the northern rim of Lebanon Valley, is situated the new Jesuit novitiate (1929), the most important edifice in the Lebanon Valley, a monument to its donors, Nicholas F. and Genevieve Brady.

Wesley, John (1703-91), clergyman, founder of Methodism, b. Epworth, England; d. London. He was educated at the Charterhouse School and Christ Church, Oxford; elected fellow of Lincoln College, 1726; and ordained a clergyman, 1728. In 1733 he accompanied Gen. Oglethorpe to Georgia, where he became interested in the Moravian Brethren. His missionary labors were unsuccessful and he returned to London, 1738. Influenced by George Whitefield, he preached his first open-air sermon, 2 April, 1739, and 20 July, 1740, founded his first school and Dunedin. Bishop: Philip ViaI’d, S.M. (1918), residence at Wernersville, town, Pennsylvania.

WESTMINSTER

Western (or Upper) Nigeria, Vicariate Apostolic of, Nigeria (British possession); entrusted to the African Missionaries of Lyons; prefecture, 1884; vicariate, 1918, Vicar Apostolic: Thomas Broderick, M.A.L. (1918), residence at Asaba. Churches and chapels, 144; stations, 310; schools, 70; catechumens, 8688; pupils, 5790; institutions, 16; Catholics, 12,501.

Westminster, Archdiocese of, England, comprises the counties of London north of the Thames, Middlesex, and Hertfordshire; suffragans see, Brentwood, Northampton, Nottingham, Portsmouth, Churches and chapels, 273; priests, secular, 314; priests, regular, 220; seminaries, 2; elementary schools, 96; other schools, 75; institutions, 22; Catholics, 260,000.

Westminster Abbey, famous English abbey, within the precincts of the Royal Palace of Westminster. The date of foundation is uncertain; it probably existed as early as the 8th century, for in a charter of King Æthelstan, 958, it is first called Westminster. Destroyed by fire, 1298, the monastery was rebuilt, 1302-86, the nave being finally completed, 1517. The first printing press in England was set up within the monastic precincts by Caxton. The monastery was suppressed, 1539, and made the cathedral church of a new see, 1540. In 1559 Queen Mary restored Westminster to the Benedictines and Dr. John Feckenham (q.v.) became abbot. Queen Elizabeth ejected the monks, 1559, who were succeeded by a Protestant dean and chapter. It is designated a “Royal Peculiar,” its officials are appointed by the Crown, and the abbey is extra-diocesan. Most of the old monastic buildings are now used as a “public” school. Nearly all English sovereigns were crowned at Westminster on the famous corona tion stone. It is also the burial place of many English sovereigns and their consorts, besides numerous other celebrities, poets, statesmen, and warriors.—C.E.; Flete, ed. Robinson, History of Westminster Abbey, Cambridge, 1909.

Westminster Cathedral, dedicated to the Precious Blood, one of the most beautiful modern churches, commenced by Card. Vaughan, 1895, from the design of Bentley. The building covers 54,000 sq. ft.; the dominating feature is the spacious nave, 60 ft. wide with domical vaulting, divided into three compartments, each 60 ft. sq. The sanctuary is Byzantine, and the retro-choir suggests the Romanesque of Northern Italy. The cruciform plan is emphasized outside by the projecting transepts. A campanile, 30 ft. sq. (St. Edward’s tower) rises to a height of 284 ft. now furnished with a “lift” (elevator) which transports sightseers to a level 75 ft. higher than the neighboring Nelson Column in Trafalgar Square. The main structural parts are of brick and concrete. The interior is designed for the application of marble and mosaic. A series of chapels are entered from the aisles of the nave and the transepts terminate in apsidal chapels. The central feature of the decoration is the great baldachino over the high altar, adorned with rich marbles. A large crucifix is suspended from the sanctuary arch.—C.E.

Westminster Catholic Federation, The, founded by Card. Bourne, 1906, for the purpose of uniting Catholics, priests and laity, for the protection of the faith; the protection and promotion of the rights of Catholics; securing Catholic representation in Parliament and on various local authorities. The federation organized effective resistance to three education bills which, if they had become law, would have seriously affected Catholic schools in England and Wales. It was also instrumental in obtaining the modification of certain secondary school regulations; its Vigilance Committee gives special attention to offensive literature, stage plays, and films, making representation to the appropriate authority in cases deemed necessary; cases of slander in the public Press regarding the Church are refuted, successful actions-at-law have been brought against offenders. Its latest activity is a movement to bring about a revision of the text-books in history used in the elementary schools, since nearly all of them contain grave errors, even misrepresentations concerning the Church. (E. W. V.)

West Virginia, the 40th state of the United States in size, the 27th in population, and the 35th state to be admitted to the Union (20 June, 1863); area, 24,170 sq. m.; pop. (1920), 1,463,701; Catholics (1928), 65,094. Before the first quarter of the 19th century Catholics were few in those parts of Virginia which included the present state of West Virginia. Rev. Jean Dubois is known to have visited Martinsburg from Frederick, Md. occasionally after 1794, but the first church there was built about 1835, by Rev. Richard Vincent Whelan, the future Bp. of the Diocese of Wheeling. Three years later the Sisters of Charity had a school there. Meanwhile in 1828 Rev. Francis Roloff was put in charge of the Catholics at Wheeling, and St. Mary’s church was erected there under Rev. James Hoerner, who served as pastor 1833-44. Included in the state are parts of the Dioceses of Wheeling and Richmond (q.v.). Catholic influence on place-names of the state is shown in the following: St. Albans, St. Clara, St. George, and St. Marys.

The U. S. Religious Census of 1916 gave the following statistics for church membership in West Virginia:

Whale, a large marine animal hunted for its oil and whalebone. It is mentioned in the Bible (Gen., 1) ; the name is also applied to the “great fish” that swallowed Jonas (Jon., 2).

What happiness can equal mine, hymn by Rev. F. W. Faber.

Wheat, a symbol of the Holy Eucharist; usually combined with grapes, thus denoting bread and wine. (J. F. S.)

Wheeling, Diocese of, West Virginia; area, 29,172; suffragan of Baltimore. Bishops: Richard V. Whelan (1860-1874); John Joseph Kain (1875-1893); Patrick James Donohue (1894-1922); John J. Swint (1922). Churches, 156; priests, secular, 98; priests, regular, 23; religious women, 242; academies, 4; secondary schools, 12; elementary schools, 39; pupils in elementary schools, 6933; institutions, 13; Catholics, 63,776.
Whipple, Amiel Weeks (1818-63), military engineer and convert, b. Greenwich, Mass.; d. Washington, D. C. He served as topographical engineer under McClellan during the Civil War, and had charge of the defences of Washington on the Virginia side. He was made Major-General by brevet just before his death.—C.E.

Whitty Abbey, Benedictine monastery, Yorkshire, England, founded 677, as a double monastery by Oswey, King of Northumberland, with St. Hilda as first abbess. Destroyed, 867, by the Danes it was refounded by William de Percy and raised to the rank of an abbey under Henry I. It was con­fiscated at the Dissolution, 1540. Cedmon, Saxon poet is among the famous monks of Whitby. The ruins of the church are most impressive. During the World War, 1914, they were damaged by Ger­man warships.—C.E.

White, a liturgical color. White vestments denote purity, innocence, holiness, joy and glory. They are therefore worn on the feasts of the Holy Trinity, the festivals of Our Lord, of the Blessed Virgin, of angels, and of saints who were not martyrs.

White, Andrew (1579-1656), missionary, "apostle of Maryland," b. London; d. there. Prefect of studies at Louvain, he accompanied Lord Balti­more's colony to Maryland. After 10 years of mission­ary work among the settlers and Indians, he was seized and sent to England, where he was tried for being a priest, and acquitted. He was the first to reduce an Indian language to grammatical form and wrote some valuable monographs on the early colony in Maryland.—C.E.

White, Edward Douglas (1825-1921), Chief Justice of the U. S. Supreme Court, b. Lafourche, La.; d. Washington. He was the son of Edward White, seventh governor of Louisiana. Educated at Mount St. Mary's, Emmitsburg; Jesuit College, New Orleans; and Georgetown University; he en­listed in the Confederate army before graduating. Admitted to the Louisiana Bar, 1888, he served on the bench of the Supreme Court, Louisiana, 1897-1910; was elected to the U. S. Senate, 1910, and named Chief Justice 12 Dec., 1910, by Pres. Taft, the first instance of a president naming a chief justice of different political affiliation. He was the recipient of the Lretare Medal from the University of Notre Dame, 1914, and vari­ous honors from other universities. Chancellor of Board of Regents of Smithsonian Institute, was a foremost authority on civil law.—C.E. ScW.

White, Stephen (1574-1646), surnamed Poly­histor, b. Clonmel, Ireland; d. Galway. His family were devoted to religion and because he was unwilling to take the oath of supremacy, he left Ireland and entered the Irish College, Salamanca, Spain, where he joined the Jesuits, 1586. Reputed to be one of the most learned men of his time in Europe, his chief interest was Irish history. The honor of fixing the historic label "Scotia" to Ireland is due to White. The "Acta SS." used his biographical accounts of early Irish saints; his best known work is "Apologia pro Hibernia adversus Cambri calumnias."—C.E.

White, Stephen Mallory (1853-1901), states­man, b. San Francisco; d. Los Angeles, Cal. He served as state senator, lieutenant governor, and U. S. Senator. His knowledge of international and constitutional law was most useful in the Philip­pine and Hawaiian questions. He was one of the representatives of the Church in the affair of the Pious Fund of the Californias.—C.E.; Mosher, Stephen M. White, His Life and Works, Los Angeles, 1903.

Whitefriars, the name of a precinct, street, and Carmel­lute monastery in London, the district being situated between Fleet Street and the Thanes, east of the Temple, and the street running from Fleet to Tudor Street. The name is derived from the color of the habit of the Carmelite friars, a part of whose convent, formerly a sanctuary possessing the privilege of protecting persons liable to arrest, was discovered in Bouverie Street, 1883, with the addition of a small 14th-century crypt, uncovered 1885, in Britton's Court, off Whitefriars Street. The district, nicknamed Albatin, is mentioned in Scott's "Peveril of the Peak" and "Fortunes of Nigel." Carmelite House, in Carmelite Street, for­merly the convent proper, is now the headquarters of the Northcliffe Press.

White Meats, as related to the law of the Church, are milk, butter and cheese. In various ages of the Church's history, the law of fast and ab­stinance forbade, principally in Lent, the use of these white meats, and also that of eggs. At present the prohibition of white meats and eggs is not part of the Church law of abstinence. (w. c. h.)

Whitman Priory, Wigtownshire, Scotland, founded in the 12th century by Fergus, Lord of Galloway, for Premonstratensian Canons. It was long a noted place of pilgrimage owing to its connection with the venerated memory of St. Ninian. The property was vested in the Crown, 1587, and given to the Bp. of Galloway, when Episcopal­anism was established in Scotland, 1606. It belonged to the bishopric until the revolution of 1688.—C.E.

Whitman, Marcus (1802-47), missionary, b. Rushville, N. Y.; d. near Walla Walla, Ore. In 1838 he opened a Presbyterian mission near Fort Walla Walla among the Cayuse Indians, a tribe occupying territory in Washington and Oregon. When, as physician, he failed to cure them of an epidemic, in 1847, they slew him and several others. A Protestant minister, Spalding, charged the Catho­lics with instigating the massacre; though serious historians have repudiated the charge, it took years to obliterate the prejudice thus aroused.

Whitsunday (from the white robes of those baptized on the vigil), or Pentekost (Gr. pente­kostos, fiftieth), feast commemorating the descent of the Holy Ghost upon the Apostles, 50 days after Easter. "Whitsunday" is also the name in Scotland of a legal term-day on which interest and rents are payable, being 15 May every year despite the day of the week on which it falls.—C.E.
Whitsun Eve, vigil of Whitsunday; before the Mass Prophecies are read as on Holy Saturday, the Font is blessed, and the Litany is sung, the Mass beginning without an Introit; in private Masses these ceremonies are omitted.

Wichita, Diocese of, Kansas; area, 42,915 sq. m.; suffragan of St. Louis, Bishops: James O'Reilly (bishop-elect, d. 1887); John Joseph Hennessy (1888-1920); Augustus J. Schwertner (1921). Churches, 153; priests, secular, 102; priests, regular, 41; religious women, 727; academies, 4; high schools, 4; parochial schools, 62; pupils in parochial schools, 7866; institutions, 11; Catholites, 59,935.

Wicked Husbandmen, title applied to a parable recorded by all three synoptists (Matt., 21; Mark, 12; Luke, 20; also Is., 5). It was spoken by Christ during Holy Week and forms part of the dispute with the priests and Pharisees in the Temple. The story deals with a certain man who having planted a vineyard and added the enclosure or hedge, the wine-press and the watch-tower, lets it out to husbandmen, and goes into a far country for a long time. In due season this owner sends his servants to receive the fruits of the field, but the husbandmen lay violent hands on them; later other servants, greater in number, are sent, and are treated in like manner. All attempts to obtain his rent through the agency of his servants, having failed, the master of the vineyard at last sends his beloved son whom, he trusts, they will reverence. The wicked husbandmen, grown avaricious and insolent, on seeing the son reflect that this is the sole heir. Hoping to seize the whole inheritance along with the vineyard for themselves, they cast the beloved son out of the vineyard and put him to death. The interpretation of this parable is possible only by reading the additional words spoken by Christ (Matt., 21; Mark, 12; Luke, 20). Christ teaches plainly in this discourse the rejection of the unbelieving leaders of Israel and the majority of those who followed them. The parable is applied to those who have neglected their duties to the Lord of the vineyard, and put what was granted to them to the use of the sons of the world and not to the use of the Lord. All attempts to obtain the fruit of the Lord's vineyard are made to fail, until the case of the beloved son is presented to those who have treated the kindness of God with neglect and contempt. This Gospel is read on the Friday after the Second Sunday in Lent.—Eaton, St. Mark, N. Y., 1920; Ollivier, tr. Leahy, Parables of Our Lord, Lond., 1889; Trigg, tr. Leahy, The Parables of the Gospel, N. Y., 1914; Madame Cecilia, St. Matthew, Lond., 1906; Ollivier, tr. Leahy, Parables of Our Lord, Lond., 1927.

Widow (Lat., vidua, bereft; cf. dividere, to divide), a woman whose husband is dead, and who has not remarried. Among the Hebrews widows were respected, and supported, if in need (Deut., 25; 2 Mach., 3). They have been an object of care in the Church since its foundation (Acts, 6), and at times formed bodies of consecrated women in the early Church. According to the Council of Trent (Sess. XXIV), 1545-63, widowhood is held to be more commendable than remarriage, but this is a matter which has to be determined according to God's will in each individual case.—C.E.

—Robert Isaac (1802-57), brother of preceding, canon of York Cathedral and Archdeacon of the East Riding. Elected Abbot of Ripon, 658, he introduced the Roman rules and practice. As Abp. of York, he founded many monasteries of the Benedictine Order, and was forced to appeal twice to Rome to prevent the subdivision of his diocese by Theodore, Abp. of Canterbury. During his exile he worked in Sussex and Wessex. He was later reinstated in Northumbria, made Bp. of Hexham, and reoccupied his see at York. Until his death he fought diligently for the rights of the Holy See. Relics at Canterbury. Feast, 12 Oct.—C.E.; Butler.

WIl (A.S., willan, will), a rational appetite; an elicited appetite, which follows upon intellectual cognition; its object is the good apprehended by the intellect; (elicited, following upon knowledge) tend to the good. Sense-appetite follows upon sense-apprehension of a desirable object; rational appetite follows on intellectual cognition. The object of the will, as of every appetitive power, is the good. The will desires with an absolute natural necessity the good in general, just as the intellect of necessity must conform to the first principles of knowledge. Particular goods the will chooses freely. Man would necessarily adhere to God and whatever is of God, if he had a clear view of the Divine Essence and of the necessary connection of particular goods with Him. This is the case with the Blessed, because they see God clearly. In this life the vision of the Divine Essence is denied us; our will consequently, necessarily wills beatitude and nothing more. We fail to see with compelling evidence that God is the Supreme Good, hence the will in this life does not
WILL

will necessarily even the Supreme Good. The existence of the will is evident from such well-known factors of our conscious life as voluntary attention, fidelity to good resolutions over a long period, resistance to desires and impulses. The will is a spiritual power, as its ability to desire spiritual objects, e.g., virtue, knowledge, attests. The freedom of the will, which means that its choice cannot be constrained from without, nor necessitated from within (libertas arbitrii), is a dogma of faith, and a truth evident from reason. Determinists deny the freedom of the will. Their view is tantamount to suppressing in human actions everything that confers on them a meritorious or blameworthy character. We cannot deserve praise or blame for actions which it is not in our power to avoid. If we are necessarily determined to will, then reflection and exhortations, precepts and punishments, praise and blame lose all meaning, and the evident testimony of conscious life is ignored. Will-training is the most important element in education. Education should aim, not at mere knowledge, but at the harmonious development of all the faculties, with a view to the attainment of man's final end. The will achieves this end by restraining and directing thoughts, feelings, and movements, and by voluntary choice of what is morally good.—C.E.; Maher, Psychology, N. Y., 1909; Rickaby, Free Will and Four English Philosophers, Lond., 1908. (A. L.)

Will and Testament of Clerics. All clerics should make a will valid in civil law providing for their property and this obligation is particularly imposed on clerics who have benefices (Canon 1301). Sacred vessels and utensils bought with church funds must be ceded to the church, and clerics should in time designate some ecclesiastic to take charge of these sacred vessels, also books, documents, or anything else found in their houses pertaining to the church. Clerics are free in the disposal of their personal property. Cardinals have the privilege of leaving sacred vessels to any church, oratory, or to some ecclesiastic. Special legislation has been enacted regarding religious.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine.

William Exmew, Blessed, martyr (1535), d. Tyburn, London. He was educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, joined the Carthusian Order, and was made procurator of the London Charterhouse, 1534. Arrested and imprisoned with Sebastian Newgate and Humphrey Middlemore, he was hanged, drawn, and quartered. Beatified, 1888.—C.E.

William Eynon (Onyon), Blessed, martyr (1539), d. Reading. He was a Benedictine, curate of St. Giles's, Reading, and was hanged with Bl. Hugh Farrington, for refusing the Oath of Supremacy.

William Filby, Blessed, martyr (c. 1557-82), b. Oxfordshire, England; d. Tyburn. He studied at Lincoln College, Oxford, and was ordained at Reims, 1581. Sent on the English mission, he was arrested with Bl. Edmund Campion and hanged. Beatified, 1888.—C.E.

William Horne, Blessed, martyr (1541), d. Tyburn, England. He was a Carthusian laybrother at the Charterhouse in London. Denying the royal supremacy, he was imprisoned, 1537, at Newgate, with the other Carthusian martyrs. His companions died of starvation, but Horne survived, and was hanged four years later.

William Lacy, Blessed, martyr (1582), d. York, England. After the death of his second wife, 1580, he went abroad, and by special dispensation was ordained at Rome. For two years he ministered to the confessors of the faith, imprisoned at York, but was finally discovered, hanged, and quartered. Beatified, 1888.—C.E.

William of Norwich, Saint (1132-44), d. near Norwich, Eng. On Holy Saturday a corpse, showing signs of a violent death, and identified as that of William, a tanner's apprentice, was found in Thorpe Wood, Norwich. According to Thomas of Monmouth, a monk in the cathedral priory of Norwich, the Jews lacerated his head with thorns, crucified him, pierced his side, and secretly buried him. The monk's credulity led him to credit the spurious statement of Theobald, a converted Jew, that every year the Jews must sacrifice a Christian in some part of the world to insure their freedom and return to their fatherland, and that in 1144 it fell to the lot of the Jews of Norwich. This story has been the principal foundation of the false "blood accusation," or accusation of Ritual Murder (q.v.) against the Jews. A chapel, called "St. Williams's in the Wood," was built over the spot where the body was found, and St. William has been popularly venerated as the innocent victim of hatred of the faith. Relics preserved at Norwich. Feast, 26 March.—C.E.; Butler.

William of Ockham (c. 1280-1349), Scholastic philosopher and controversial writer, b. Ockham, Surrey, England; d. Munich, Germany. Entering the Order of St. Francis, he became a teacher at the University of Paris, 1320. He composed works on Aristotelian physics and on logic; later contributed pamphlets and treatises to the polemical literature of the day; and secular absolutism and a reform of Scholasticism both in method and in content. The aim of this reform was simplification, and with it was united a tendency towards scepticism. In the process of simplification he went too far, and sacrificed much that was essential in Scholasticism, while trying to rid Scholasticism of faults which were incidental. His best known contribution to Scholastic philosophy is his theory of universals, a modified form of nominalism. Although Ockham's attitude toward the established order in the Church and the recognized system of philosophy was one of protest, nevertheless, in his polemical writings he recognized the authority of the Church in spiritual matters, and never did anything to diminish that authority. Similarly, although he rejected the rational demon—striation of several fundamental truths in Christian theology, he held firmly to the same truths as matters of faith, and his effort to simplify Scholasticism was undoubtedly well-intentioned.—C.E.; Turner, History of Philosophy, Bost., 1903.

William of Vercelli, Saint (1085-1142), abbot and founder of the Williamites or Hermits of Monte Vergine; b. Vercelli, Italy; d. Guglielto. At the age of fifteen he resolved to renounce the world and made a pilgrimage to St. James of Compostela; returning to Italy he retired to Monte Vergine to live as a hermit; soon others followed him and he gathered these disciples about him and built a church dedicated to the Blessed Virgin; in 1128 he founded houses at Serra Cognata, Conza, and Guglielto; his order was approved 1107. Relics at Monte Vergine. Feast, R. Cal., 25 June.—C.E.; Butler.

William of Wykeham (1324-1404), Bp. of Winchester, Chancellor of England, b. Wickham, England; d. South Waltham. His rise was rapid but short-lived, for he resigned the Great Seal in 1372, was impeached and his see seized. In 1389 he was appointed chancellor again. In his temporary absence from state affairs, he founded Winchester College, the first college in which the chapel was an essential part of the design, as St. Mary's Grammar School at Winchester. He commenced the transformation of his cathedral from the Norman style to the Perpendicular.—C.E.

William the Conqueror (c. 1027-87), King of England and Duke of Normandy, b. Falaise, Normandy; d. near Rouen, France. He was the son of Robert, Duke of Normandy. In 1066 he invaded England, defeated Harold at Hastings, and was crowned in Westminster Abbey. His reign was marked with instances of great severity, e.g., the cruel Forest Laws and heavy taxation, but he established his government on a firm and lasting basis. He compiled the Domesday Book.—D.C.E.

Wilmington, Diocese of, Delaware; comprises the State of Delaware, and the eastern shores of Maryland and Virginia; area, 6211 sq. m.; suffragan of Baltimore. Bishops: Thomas A. Becker (1888-96); Alfred A. Curtis (1868-86); John J. Monaghan (1897-1925); Edmond J. Fitzmaurice (1925). A member of the diocese, John J. Raskoh, has created a fund to enable the bishop and clergy to carry on the diocesan and parochial work.

Wilton Abbey, Benedictine convent, Wiltshire, England, originally founded for priests by Earl Wulstan, c. 773; St. Alburga, his widow, changed it into a convent; King Egbert, who gave his consent, is usually counted as the founder. It is best known as the home of St. Edith, chief patron of Wilton. The convent was confiscated at the Dissolution, 1539.—C.E.

Wimbledon College, London, founded 1892 by the Society of Jesus, an offshoot of Stonyhurst, has an army department, founded, 1898, and a day school for boys. Faculty, 17.

Wimborne Minster (Wimborne or Wimborne), a Benedictine double monastery in Dorsetshire, England, 705-723, founded by Sts. Cuthburga and Quiburg, sisters of Ina, King of the West Saxons. In the 9th century the monastery was probably destroyed by Danes, and all trace of the Saxon buildings has disappeared. At a later date, secular canons were established at Wimborne, but in 1547 the college was suppressed, and the monaster is now an Anglican church. A small chained library, dating from 1696, is of interest.—C.E.

Winchester, ancient diocese, England, founded 635, together with that of Sherborne, by the partition of the Diocese of Dorchester, but separated from Sherborne in 676. With two archdeaconries and 362 parishes, it was second only to Canterbury and York, numbering among its episcopate St. Swithin, 17th in line. The present fine cathedral was built by Walkelin, the first Norman bishop. The last Catholic bishop was John White (1556-60).

Winchester College, Winchester, Hampshire, England, earliest of the great English Public Schools and their model, founded, 1376, by William of Wykeham, Bp. of Winchester and Chancellor of England, for 70 scholars, to prepare them for entrance to the University of Oxford. It was authorized by papal Bull, 1375, as the grammar school of St. Mary at Winchester, for the relief of poor scholars and to replenish the ranks of the clergy depleted by the Black Death; chartered, 1382; the first foundation of a college independent of a cathedral or university, and the first instance of the union of grammar school and university, in separate locations; a precedent followed by Henry VI when founding Eton and King's College, Cambridge, 1440. Architecturally the chapel was an important part of the design, and the statutes provided for the daily performance of the Divine Office and the daily singing of seven Masses at the high altar; Winchester took less kindly to the Reformation than Eton, and favored Mary Tudor. Strict regulations for studies and scholastic discipline promulgated by Bp. Wykeham are still very closely observed, notwithstanding the change of religion. Wykeham's collegiate buildings (c. 1375); two quadrangles, cloister, and ambulatory are still in use; Eton and King's College, Oxford, and the 15th-century sign informing the pupil that he "must learn, leave, or be flogged with a four-twigged rod," are noteworthy; among the additions are "Old Commoners," 1730, for boys who were not on the foundation. Sir Thomas Brown, Dr. Arnold of Rugby, and Sydney Smith were scholars. A recent tablet pay's affectionate tribute to Lionel Pigot Johnson (1867-1902), Catholic essayist and poet, a former pupil.—Walcott, William of Wykeham and his Colleges, Lond., 1897.

Winckelmann, vin'kél-mán, Johann Joachim (1717-88), archaeologist and art historian, b. Stralsund, Germany; d. Trieste, Austria. After an excellent education, including courses in theology and medicine, he settled in Saxony in 1748 and was encouraged in the study of the history of art by the painter Frederick Oeser. Through Count Alberic Archinto, papal nuncio at Dresden and later a cardinal in Rome, he became a Catholic, 1754. After publishing a book on art he went to Italy in 1754, serving as librarian first to Archinto and after his death to Card. Alessandro Albani, the munif-WINDHOLM, VICARIAE APOSTOLICAE (formerly CIMBERBASIA), Southwestern Africa; comprises Daroom, being divided from Great Namaqualand by the southern limits of Gabasis, Windhoek, Karibib, and Swakopmund Districts; entrusted to the Oblates of Mary Immaculate; Prefecture of Lower Cimbebasia, 1892; Vicariate of Windhoek, 1926. Vicar Apostolic: Joseph Gotthardt, O.M.I. (1921). Churches, 11; chapels, 9; priests, 26; religious women, 52; schools, 23; pupils, 841; catechumens, 278; Catholics, 5100.

WINDING SHEET OF CHRIST, FEAST OF THE HOLY, Friday after the second Sunday in Lent, but no longer a calendar feast. It originated in Besançon, France, 1206, and was kept on 11 July. Another feast which originated at Chambéry, Savoy, about 1495 is celebrated on 4 May in Savoy, Piedmont, and Sardinia as the patron feast of the royal house of Savoy. For the relic itself, see SHROUD, HOLY.—C.E.

WINDLE, SIR BERTRAM C. A. (1858-1929), scientist, apologist, b. Market Rasen, England; d. Toronto, Canada. Son of a parson of the Established Church, he became a Catholic, 1883. Educated at Trinity College, Dublin, he was co-founder and subsequently dean of medicine of Birmingham University. Made president of Queen’s College, Cork, 1904, he achieved his idea of a national university with Dublin, Cork, and Galway as constituents. In 1909 Pius X made him a Knight of St. Gregory; he was knighted by King George, 1912, for his services to education; and Pius XI added Ph.D. to his numerous honorary degrees. He was university medical examiner at Glasgow, Trinity, and Cambridge, and a Fellow of the Royal Society. Besides his original work in anatomy, archaeology, and teratology (a branch of biology treating of abnormal growths, on which he was Britain’s greatest authority), he wrote much on ethnology, anthropology, and spiritism. In America he is best known as an apologist, for, from his arrival, 1919, at St. Michael’s College, Toronto University, he labored as professor and as president of the Catholic Truth Society of Canada, to reconcile in the public mind scientific progress with the Church’s teaching. He was a constant contributor to the best American Catholic periodicals and the author of 22 published volumes.—Catholic Encyclopedia and Its Makers, N. Y., 1917.

WINDHOEK, VICARIATE APOSTOLIC or (formerly CIMBERBASIA), Southwest Africa, comprises Damara (formerly Cimbebasia), and Swakopmund Districts; entrusted to the Oblates of Mary Immaculate; Prefecture of Lower Cimbebasia, 1892; Vicariate of Windhoek, 1926. Vicar Apostolic: Joseph Gotthardt, O.M.I. (1921). Churches, 11; chapels, 9; priests, 26; religious women, 52; schools, 23; pupils, 841; catechumens, 278; Catholics, 5100.

WINE, (Lat., vinum), the fermented juice of the grape; used in the Mass and changed by the words of consecration into the Precious Blood of Christ. Only pure grape-wine may be used in the Mass, and it must not be sour or otherwise unfit. (C. J. B.)

Wine, Old and New, parable in the N.T. (Luke, 5), given at the feast prepared by St. Matthew after his call and conversion. After explaining in the parables of the old wine and new bottles, and of the old garment and new patches, to some bitterly querulous questioners, why He did not impose the practises of the Pharisees and of St. John the Baptist on His own disciples, Jesus turns to the latter, giving the present parable as an excuse for those who plague Him so persistently. It is not a question of whether the old wine is better than the new, because Christ’s doctrine, the new wine, is certainly better than that of the Pharisees or of the Precursor, but of a matter of taste to which one has grown accustomed. Brought up in the spirit and practises of the Pharisees, of which they approve, these questioners are loath to accept the teaching of Jesus, to them new, untried, and hence of doubtful value. Thus would Our Lord excuse those who so bitterly pursued Him for His new ways and doctrines, and with the same spirit of gentleness must all those be animated who would lead souls from the paths of sin and error to the ways of truth and virtue.—Fonck, tr. Leahy, Parables of the Gospel, N. Y., 1915.

Winefrid, Sint, Virgin (560-660), b. Holywell, Wales; d. Gwytherin. According to her legend, she fled the suit of Caradoc, the son of Prince Alen, who overtook her and severed her head, which rolled down hill; where it rested, a spring gushed forth. Her uncle, St. Beuno, gathered the remains together and after a short interval, was astonished to find Winefrid restored to life. She lived in almost perpetual ecstasy as abbess at Holywell and later at Gwytherin. Holywell became a famous place of pilgrimage, and numerous miracles occurred there. Feast, 3 Nov.—C.E.

Wine-press, word used in Isaias, 63: “I have trodden the wine-press alone, and of the Gentiles there is not a man with me.” This is interpreted as Our Lord speaking of His Passion.

Winnipeg, Archdiocese of, Manitoba, established, 1915; comprises that part of Manitoba south of the line dividing townships 44 and 45 and west of Lake Winnipeg and the Red River, except the territory south of the line dividing townships 9 and 10 and east of the meridian between the 12th and 13th ranges west of the principal meridian; immediately subject to the Holy See. Archbishop: Alfred Arthur Simott (1916). Churches, 88; priests, secular, 57; priests, regular, 30; religious women, 325; college, 1; academies, 8; free parish schools, 12; Indian schools, 2; institutions, 9; Catholics, 57,500.

Winona, Diocese of, Minnesota; embraces Winona, Wabasha, Olmsted, Dodge, Steele, Waseca, Blue Earth, Watonwan, Cottonwood, Murray, Pine, Stone, Rock, Nobles, Jackson, Faribault, Martin, Freeborn, Mower, Fillmore, and Houston counties; area, 12,282 sq. m.; suffragan of St. Paul. Bishops: Joseph B. Cotter (1889-1909); Patrick R. Heffron (1910-27); Francis M. Kelly (1928). Churches, 125; priests, secular, 119; priests, regular, 6; religious women, 796; colleges, 2; academies, 2; high schools, 29; parochial schools, 38; pupils in parochial schools, 8,072; institutions, 5; Catholics, 69,800.

Wisconsin, the 25th state of the United States in size, the 13th in population, and the 30th state to be admitted to the Union (29 May, 1848); area, 56,066 sq. m.; pop. (1920), 2,632,067; Catholics, 578,000.

Green Bay has in his possession a historic and beautiful souvenir of this early mission, in a monstrosity presented in 1696 by Nicholas Perrot, then commandant of the West and a staunch friend of the missionaries. A third mission, St. Mark's, was founded inland from Lake Winnebago. These missions, attended subsequently by Frs. Henri Nouvel, Jean Eulal, Jean Chardon, Marin le Franc, and Pierre du Jannay, suffered during Indian wars and were gradually abandoned after Cadillac's efforts, c. 1701, to concentrate the Indians near Detroit. They were finally given up on the suppression of the French Jesuits, 1763. The Green Bay mission was revived in 1830 by Rev. Stephen Badin, assisting Bp. Fenwick of Cincinnati, who visited the mission in 1831. The church was reestablished at Chequamegon in 1835. Other missionaries at Green Bay were the Dominican, Fr. Samuel Mazzuchelli, Fr. Theodore van den Broeck, and the Redemptorists, Fr. Simon Sanderl and Fr. Hatcher. The first Mass said in Milwaukee, the site of which had been visited by Fr. Buisson de St. Cosme of the Quebec Seminary in 1698, was offered about 1835, by Fr. Charles de Foucauld. Madame Florimont in the house of the founder of the city, Solomon Juneau. The first church, St. Peter's, was started in 1839 by Rev. Patrick Kelly who had previously offered Mass in the court-house. He also attended Racine, Kenosha, and Burlington. The state includes the Archdiocese of Milwaukee, and the Dioceses of Green Bay, La Crosse, and Superior (qq.v.). Catholic influence on the place-names of the state is shown in the following: De Pere, Mount Calvary, St. Cloud, St. Croix Falls, St. Francis, St. Nazianz. The U. S. Religious census of 1916 gave the following statistics for church membership in Wisconsin:

Wisdom, attribute of God Who is All-Wise. Christ is “the power of God and the wisdom of God” (1 Cor., 1). (22d.)

Wisdom (O.E., wis, to know, certain), the habit or gift of judging rightly in all that pertains to life and conduct, and appreciation of the truths that come by revelation and by study and preference for heavenly to earthly things; the object of the science of philosophy; gift of the Holy Ghost, attribute of Our Lord (1 Cor., 1); title of book by Father Baker “Holy Wisdom,” on contemplation.—C.E.; Manning, Internal Mission of the Holy Ghost, N. Y. (20a.)

Wisdom, Book of, Septuagint, inspired book of the O.T. placed in the Vulgate and derived ed-tions between the Canticle of Canticles and Ecclesiasticus; called deuterocanonical, because being found in Greek and not in Hebrew it was not placed in the Palestinian or Protopc.

In the Syriac translation, the title is: "The Book of the Great Wisdom of Solomon," and in the Old Latin Version the heading reads, "Salutis Salomonis." Its title indicates its theme, viz., the inculcation of a proper regard for Wisdom or Divine Direction on the part of rulers. The addition of the name Solomon does not indicate authorship but rather the fact that the doctrine is presented as the personified utterance of the Wise Ruler of Israel, and according to some of his traditional teaching. The examples adduced belong to a later age than that of the son of David. It is probably the work of one man (Divinely inspired) an Alexandrian Jew, living during the period of Ptolemy IV Philopator, 264 B.C., or Euergetes II Physcon, 117 B.C. Composed of 19 chapters the Book may be aptly divided into two parts separated by a beautiful prayer for wisdom (9). (1) Exhortation to rulers to observe justice and wisdom (1-8); (2) The advantages of Wisdom evidenced by God's dealings with His chosen people in contrast with the condition of idolatrous nations, particularly Egypt and Chanaan (10-19). Its Divine authority is vouched for by the use made of the Book by the Apostles and the early Church (Rom., 1); a compendium of Wisdom (13-16). Wisdom means knowledge so perfect that it directs the will towards perfect action (6), a gift of God bestowed on suppliants enabling them to triumph over evil. In God it dwells identified with the Word (9), and immanent with the Holy Spirit. This is regarded as foreshadowing the Revelation of the Blessed Trinity, though Greek philosophic terms are used it is clear from the context that the author was not imbued with Platonic errors concerning creation, matter, or the existence of the soul. Selections from the Book of Wisdom occur frequently in the Mass and Breviary; Introits on Ash Wednesday (11); Thursday after Easter (16); Pentecost (1); 3rd Epistle for Many Martyrs (3 and 5); St. Philip Neri (7). In the liturgical works of the Church the title of Wisdom is also given to Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Ecclesiasticus. —C.E.; Pope; Schumacher.

Wiseman, Nicholas Patrick (1802-65), cardinal, first Abp. of Westminster, b. Seville; d. London. After 20 years in Rome, where he was rector of the English College, he went to England, became intensely interested in the Catholic situation, and founded the "Dublin Review." Subsequently he was appointed president of Oscott College during the period of the Oxford Movement, and confirmed Newman. As vicar Apostolic of the London district, he opened the Gothic church of St. George, Southwark. In 1850 he was made cardinal. At the same time the pope created the Catholic hierarchy in England and Wiseman returned there as Abp. of Westminster. On his arrival he worked, with his preaching and writing, to quell the storm which the pope's act had caused. He founded the Academia in London; attended the Catholic Congress at Meechin, and supported Bp. Vaughan's work for foreign missions.—C.E.

Ward, Life and Times of Cardinal Wiseman, Lond., 1898.

Witchcraft (O.E., wicc, witch; craft, craft), that practice of the magic arts which involves the idea of a diabolical pact, or an appeal to the spirits of evil, by a person, in order to secure the destruction of obnoxious persons, to recall the dead, etc. The traditional belief in witchcraft, or sorcery, has existed since antiquity (Code of Hammurabi; the Bible: 1 Kings, 15; Gal., 5). The Church does not deny the possibility of human communication with evil spirits in rare instances, but she did oppose the persecutions which were leveled against so-called witches in the 10th and 17th centuries. Gregory XV (1621-23) issued a Constitution against persecutions for witchcraft, 1623; and Friedrich von Spee, S.J., published a book against the popular condemnation of witches, 1631.—C.E.; Kittredge, Witchcraft in Old and New England, Cambridge, Mass., 1928.

Witch of Endor. Saul, discouraged by the misfortune of the end of his reign, violated the law which he had renewed against divination, and had recourse to superstitious practises. His servants having informed him that a witch lived at Endor, he went in disguise to the sorceress and begged her to invoke the spirit of Samuel (1 Kings, 28). What she herself could never have done, was Divinely vouchsafed. An apparition suddenly rose before her, and Saul, by the mantle, recognized Samuel, who announced to the guilty king his tragic end. (P. J. L.)

Witness, in canon law, a person legally competent to give evidence of a fact. Two are required for a valid marriage; witnesses are examined in the process of canonization of saints; two or three first class witnesses are generally required to prove a fact before an ecclesiastical court. An official of the Church, such as a pastor or chancellor, is accepted as sufficient in proving an official act performed by him, e.g., a baptism. Some persons are not admitted as witnesses because of factors such as prejudice or a bad reputation.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine.

Witnesses, at a marriage, two in number, are strictly required for its validity. Only Catholics may lawfully act as witnesses, unless permission be obtained from the bishop.—Ayrinhac, Marriage Legislation in the New Code of Canon Law, N. Y., 1919.

Woden (A.-S., furious, raging warrior), also called Odin, Woden, Wotan, Teutonic god identified with Mercury by the Romans; hence the name Wednesday (Woden's day) as a translation of dies Mercurii, the fourth day of the week. He was originally one of the chief gods, probably a storm god, of the Ases, the minor deities of Scandinavian mythology who dwelt in Asgaard. Later he became chief of the Ases, world-ruler, patron of arts and sciences, tutelary deity of heroes, war god, and god of the dead. He is represented as riding his eight-footed horse Sleipner.

Wolff, George Deren (1822-94), editor, b. Martinsburg, West Virginia; d. Norristown, Pa. As minister of the German Reformed Church he was a staunch follower of John Nevin, but when he saw the inconsistency of his position, he joined the Church. He became editor of the "Catholic Mirror," editor-in-chief of the "Catholic Standard," and aided in the establishment of the "American Catholic Quarterly Review."—C.E.

Wolsey, Thomas (1472-1530), cardinal, Abp. of York, b. Ipswich, England; d. Leicester Abbey. As Lord Chancellor of England his foreign policy included an alliance with France, but later he advocated the neutrality of England. He incurred the jealousy of the nobility by his power, provoked the hostility of the people by his financial exactions and the eminence of all by his extravagant pomp, and when he opposed Anne Boleyn's marriage to Henry VIII, his downfall was complete. He was charged with high treason, and died in disgrace. He founded Christ Church College, Oxford.—C.E.; Taunton, Thomas Wolsey, Legate and Reformer, Lond., 1901.

Wolstan (Wulstan), Saint, confessor (c. 1008-95), Bp. of Worcester, b. Long Itchington, Warwickshire, England; d. Worcester. Educated at Evesham and Peterborough, he was ordained, 1038, and entered the Benedictine Order. Elevated to the See of Worcester, 1062, he was the last English bishop appointed under a Saxon king, the last episcopal representative of the Church of Bede, and the link between it and the Church of Lanfranc and Anselm. He retained his position after the Norman conquest, though nearly all the Saxon nobles and clergy were deprived of their offices. Canonized, 1203. Feast, 19 Jan.—C.E.; Butler.

Woman, Womanhood. The history of womanhood in the Christian era is one of the chief proofs of the Divine origin and resources of the Catholic Church. The Virgin Mother of Christ and the redeemed Mary Magdalene have been for all the centuries evidences of the lofty estate of woman—whether preserved by special grace from the slightest taint of evil, or restored by special grace from an evil life. From the very beginning women have had a place not only of honor but of influence in the Church. They waited on the Apostles, assisted them in their evangelical labors, introduced them into the leading circles of the cities of Asia Minor, and, when the Franks entered Rome enabled them to win over to the new faith women and, in some cases, men of imperial and senatorial families. What Eustochium and Paula did for St. Jerome, women of his time and later, both in the East and West, did to aid the leaders of the Church, laymen as well as ecclesiastics, in their struggles with the enemies of religion and in their pioneering work for the upbuilding of Christianity and civilization. One Melania did more to solve the problem of freeing slaves than churchmen who possessed them not, could possibly do. Brigid helped to spread the faith in Ireland, as did Bridget later in Sweden. Clotilda induced Clovis to become a Catholic, and thus brought the Franks into the Church as did Bertha in England with Æthelberht and the English people through St. Augustine. For countless similar influences the Church was not ungrateful. She had restored woman to her rightly dignified position among men—indeed, it was this restoration that inspired women to work for her so zealously—and she devoted all her energies to cultivating the piety and devotion of which woman was so capable. From the earliest days of Christianity women had sought the seclusion of religious life in one form or other and the Church had encouraged them in this to advance them not in virtue only but in learning also. Before the Reformation women of social standing were quite the equals of men in knowledge of the classics, of medieval literature, of the liturgy. They not only frequented, but also lectured in the universities. The Reformation stopped all that and we have witnessed during the past half century the struggle women have had to make for rights in education equal with those of men. The characteristic of Catholic women in the modern world is their steadfastness in religion, the zeal of those who remain in the world in charitable, social, and educational work, the eagerness with which they seek life in religious communities in order to devote themselves to works of mercy, spiritual and corporal. During the 19th century especially, many women of ordinary advantages in birth and education, and with scarcely any human resources, have founded religious congregations which now have houses in nearly every part of the world, counting their members by thousands, and those whom they educate or assist by millions.—C.E.; Blunt, Great Wives and Mothers, N. Y., 1917; Mozans, Women in Science, N. Y., 1913; Blence, The Emancipation of Women, Lond., 1913. (Ed.)

Woman Suffrage (Lat., suffragium, a vote). Men have always taken the largest part in political revolutions organized to obtain a voice in their own government and have claimed the right to speak for women as well as for themselves. Women in general, engaged in household duties, have by social customs and age-old traditions submitted to their leadership. History shows many instances, however, where individual women protested against this assumption of authority, by pen and petition. In England, the cradle of representative government, women signed a petition for the right to vote in 1499. This was followed by others. In Italy, when the universities were thrown open to women in the 14th and 15th centuries, they demanded equality of rights. In Sweden, in 1847, efforts were made by high-spirited women to obtain a voice in the government. Due to the Civil War's emancipation of Negro women, and the civil, legal, and political results of the 14th and 15th Amendments to the National Constitution, efforts to obtain the franchise for women received a notable setback. At length of "equal suffrage" demands were made in every state, and in 1910 the 19th Amendment to the Constitution was adopted. The Nineteenth Amendment of 1919 guaranteed equal suffrage, but it was not until 1920 that women were allowed to vote in all states. This was the result of a long struggle, fought by a few brave pioneers who believed in the right of women to participate in the government. The struggle was not easy, and many sacrifices were made. Women gave up their time and energy to promote the cause, and many suffered personal loss and hardship. But the victory was finally won, and women now have the right to vote in all states, and can play an important role in the political process. The Nineteenth Amendment has opened up new opportunities for women, and has helped to equalize the political rights of men and women. It is a great victory for democracy, and a step forward in the advancement of women's rights.
cherished plan to obtain the so-called presidential suffrage for women. Many states adopted, in various modified ways, the plans of the National Association, and by 1919 full suffrage had been secured for women in 16 states and Alaska. Finally, through the combined efforts of the National Association and the National Woman's Party, the 19th Amendment to the Constitution, giving nation-wide suffrage to women, was adopted by the House, 21 May, 1919, and by the Senate, 4 June, 1919. Ratified by the necessary three-fourths vote (36 states), it was declared effective 26 Aug., 1920. The total number of women of voting age in the whole United States is approximately 27,000,000. Suffrage movements in Great Britain and the United States have run in parallel lines since their beginning in each country (c. 1832). The International Woman Suffrage Alliance, formed in 1904, spread its influence all over the world. Even in the Orient, suffrage for women is seriously discussed. It is probable that in a few years women will have a vote in all civilized countries.

Wood-Carving, in general, the production from woods of objects of art and trade by means of a sharp instrument. Objects carved from wood were used for religious purposes in antiquity but the art did not receive full development until the Christian era. The doors of St. Sabina in Rome is the most important monument of early Christian wood-carpentry. Reliquaries and cathedrae were made of wood. Almost all of the early art of the Germans was in wood. Low relief was used extensively in the Romanesque period, but towards the end of the period high relief appeared and the greatest achievements are the doors of the cathedral at Spoleto (1214). In the Gothic period the art was sufficiently advanced for carved altars and choir stalls. It became independent of the methods of stone-carving, and greater delicacy was attained. The work was usually covered by polychromatic painting. Other articles of church furniture produced were the celebrant's seat, episcopal throne, pulpits, doors, and reading desks. Statues and crucifixes were also carved. The Renaissance found opportunity for carved work in organ cases, pews, and especially paneling for ecclesiastical halls. The best work of this period was produced in Italy. There was great demand for wood-carving in the Baroque period. Pulpits, pulpits, altars, and confessionals were ornamented with lavish decoration. The lack of artistic depth and force of the Empire style made the ecclesiastical wood-work of this period unsatisfactory.—C.E.

Woods, Julian Edmund Tenison (1832-89), priest and scientist, b. Southwark, London; d. Sydney, New South Wales. He accompanied Bishop Willson to Tasmania, as assistant in the Catholic schools, was ordained there, became director general of schools, and for 11 years labored with great success in New South Wales, Queensland, and Tasmania. In the meantime he developed his interest in geology and natural science, wrote "Geological Observations in South Australia," reported on the coal resources of the East for the British government, explored the mineral districts of South Australia, Java, and Siam.—C.E.

Woodstock College, legally College of the Sacred Heart, Woodstock, Md., the house of philosophical and theological studies of the Jesuit Maryland-New York province, located for a time at Boston and later at Georgetown, D. C., and opened at the present site, 1899; faculty, 39; students, 922.

Worcester, ancient diocese, England, founded 680, at the division of the Diocese of Mercia, with Tatfrith as first nominee and Bosel as first actual bishop, whence the episcopal succession, which includes Giulio de' Medici (afterward Pope Clement VII), remains unbroken until the death of the last Catholic bishop, Richard Pates (1555-65).

Word, THE. This designation of Christ occurs first in St. John's Apocalypse, 10, and afterwards in the prologue of His Gospel, and in the introduction to his first Epistle. The Greek term which it renders, logos, means not only word, which is its nearest equivalent in English, but the thought which is expressed by the word, and also at times reason. The expression indicates how the Son of God is distinguished from the Father. The Son of a spiritual being, of a pure intelligence, is His thought, which the O.T. called His wisdom or His word, a word which is distinct from Him, but which nevertheless is in Him. The O.T. did not make it clear whether it was from God or of God. The wisdom or word of God was a real person. Regarding the relation of St. John's doctrine with the earlier or contemporary doctrines, Greek or Jewish, one may read the Appendix to St. John's Gospel in the Westminster Version. The subject is well dealt with in French in Fr. Lagrange's commentary on St. John, and in Fr. Lebreton's "Origines du Dogme de la Trinite."—C.E., IX, 328.

Works, Good, and Salvation. The 16th-century heresy taught that justification was by faith alone. The 20th-century heresy proclaims that it is not what one believes that matters, but what one does. Christ proclaimed that faith was necessary, but that it was not sufficient: "I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in me, although he be dead, shall live" (John, 11). He Who spoke thus of faith, also declared concerning works: "Not every one that saith to Me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven: but he that doth the will of My Father who is in heaven, he shall enter into the kingdom of heaven" (Matt., 7). Christ, therefore, taught that works as well as faith were necessary for salvation. St. James says: "What shall it profit, my brethren, if one say he hath faith, but hath not works? Shall faith be able to save him?... faith, also, if it have not works, is dead in itself" (James, 2). Christ proclaimed the same when He said: "the son of man shall come in the glory of his Father with his Angels: and then will he render to every man according to his works" (Matt., 16). If language has any meaning, it is clear that faith without works is condemnation rather than justification. (St. J. R.)

World, THE. The world means the universe, all creation: "the world was made by him (God)" (John, 1). In Scripture it often means the elements in the world which are opposed to Christ: "Know ye, that it (the world) hath hated me before you" the Son, made man and named Jesus Christ, is worshiped in His Divinity and in His Humanity, is revealed to us by Christ, as one God in three Divine Persons, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; God the Son, made man and named Jesus Christ, is worshiped in His Divinity and in His Humanity, and that as naturally present in heaven and as sacramentally present in the Holy Eucharist. Even the veneration of the Saints is ultimately reducible to worship of God, since they are venerated because of the power of God manifested in them. “God is wonderful in His saints.” In its external expression, worship went through a natural development under the guidance of the Holy Spirit and of the Church, the nucleus being what the Apostles had seen and heard from Christ. The Sunday superseded the Sabbath as the Lord’s Day by Apostolic arrangement. “The breaking of the bread” from house to house early yielded to gatherings in temples, significantly called churches (kyriake olke—house of the Lord). The service consisted of the repetition of the Last Supper with hymns and prayers (The Mass).

During the first three centuries of our era, its inner spirit was developed to greater clearness under the influence of the Trinitarian and Christological controversies; during the following 300 years, from the Peace of Christendom to Gregory the Great, its external form was gradually determined. Later accidental developments followed as the implications of the Real Presence were more explicitly felt by the pseudo-Phdobination. With that synchronizes the breach of the original Protestant groups, who, rejecting the Sacrifice of the Mass, the Real Presence, and even the definite statement of the Divinity of Christ, in the degree in which they reject these, find no more reason for ceremonial, although many of them perform rites without reality. Catholic worship, meanwhile, like a living thing, flowered in richer developments, especially in Eucharistic Worship.—C.E.; Bridgett, The Ritual of the New Testament, Lond., 1887; Duchesne, Christian Worship, Its Origin and Evolution, Lond., 1904. (A. T. Z.)

Wounds, Feast of the Five Sacred, one of the seven Offices of the Mysteries of the Passion of Christ. It has been celebrated in various countries and religious orders since the 14th century. In 1831 it was adopted by the Passionists and the city of Rome and since then by a number of dioceses and religious communities, to be celebrated on the Friday after the Third Sunday of Lent.—C.E., XV, 715.

Writers' Guild, Catholic, organized, 1919, by Patrick Card. Hayes, Abp. of New York, at the instance of Dr. John Talbot Smith. The object is to provide a medium of aid for Catholic authors, journalists, artists, illustrators, and playwrights. The National Dante Committee awarded a commemorative medal, issued by the Casa di Dante in Rome, to the guild on the occasion of its imposing commemoration of the six-hundredth anniversary of Dante’s death.—C.E., Suppl., 169.

Written Word, a title of a Bible derived from the ancient Jewish custom of referring to the Divine message as the “Word” (Gen., 15; 1 Kings, 16). Since the Bible is the inspired vehicle of communication between God and man, it is the “Word” par excellence; and since it is written, it is the “Written Word” par excellence. (J. A. C.)

Wrong. In ethics wrong is the opposite of right. It denotes: (1) actions which deviate from the standard of morality; (2) circumstances and conditions which tend to evoke sinful action. Both...
Würzburg, city, Bavaria, and former principality of the Holy Roman Empire. First mentioned in 704 as Castellum Virtheubach, the territory was evangelized by St. Kilian and was established as a diocese in 741 by St. Boniface, who consecrated St. Burchart, first bishop. The see was founded in 752. In 1033 the bishops received the rights of coinage and exacting customs from Emperor Henry II, in 1126 the title of Duke of Franconia from Henry V, and in 1171 complete judicial authority in the entire diocese and duchy, and over all the countships of Würzburg from Barbarossa. These privileges made them temporal sovereigns over a principality of 1900 sq. m., and they occupied a brilliant position among the German princes. Despite continual conflicts between the bishops and the citizens, Würzburg flourished, reaching its fullest development under the greatest princebishop, Von Mespelbrunn (1573-1617), who reestablished the university, founded in 1402, and made it famous throughout Europe. Würzburg was secularized in 1801 and given to Bavaria, 1815. Besides a fine Romanesque cathedral, built between the 12th and 14th centuries, the city possesses many old abbeys, the Holy Redeemer (c. 745), containing the crypt of St. Kilian, St. Andrew's (c. 1013), and the Seeke the secular power of the see of Würzburg is now the seat of a diocese.—C.E.

Würzburg Abbeys. The city of Würzburg was the seat of four Benedictine abbeys. (1) Abbey of the Holy Redeemer (S. Salvatoris), founded c. 745 by St. Burchart. The monks in charge of the cathedral school were replaced, 786, by canons styled Brothers of St. Kilian, the expelled monks going to the Abbey of Neustadt. (2) St. Andrew’s (afterwards St. Burchart’s), founded after 748, by St. Burchart, had a famous monastic school. Pius II, 1464, changed the abbey church into a collegiate church and permitted the former monks to remain as canons. (3) St. Stephen’s Abbey, founded 1013 by Henry of Rothenburg, for the expelled Latin works, Wyclif is credited, even by contemporaries, with having translated the whole of the Bible, and two “Wyclifite” versions are in existence.—C.E.

Wyclifites Bibles (1380-88), two English Bibles (ed. by Forshall and Madden). The Anglican Abp. Usher and others thought that they were made long before the New Testament was commonly attributed to him and dated 1380, its O.T. to Hereford and dated 1382. The later version is called Purvey’s and dated 1388. No Wyclifite ever claimed it, but Abp. Arundel said that Wyclif tried to undermine the very Faith by means of a “new translation (nova translationis) of Scripture in the mother tongue.” This may mean a new version (implying an older one?), or a novel rendering of passages, in booklets and tracts, to promote his views.

Wyclifites, the followers of John Wyclif (q.v.). His institution of the “poor priests” (see Lollards) who taught the people in the vernacular gave form to his followers and the name Wyclifites is rightly applied to these, though they never regarded themselves as a sect apart from the Catholic Church. It was not in England but in Bohemia that the Wyclifites gained the greatest ground. There John Huss (q.v.), using Wyclif’s writings as a basis, succeeded in all but overthrowing the Catholic Church and in making Wyclif’s teachings the re-
Wyoming, the 8th state of the United States in size, and the 47th in population, and the 44th state to be admitted to the Union (10 July, 1890); area, 97,914 sq. m.; pop. (1920), 194,402; Catholics (1928), 25,672. The history of the Church in Wyoming is on the whole of fairly recent development. It is known however that Fr. Pierre de Smet, S.J., journeyed through the region on several of his trips to the Northwest, and it was he who offered the first Mass, 5 July, 1840, at a rallying-point of the fur traders, near Green River, where the congregation also included Flathead and Snake Indians. One of the most important peace conferences held by the devoted and patriotic missionary with the Indians took place, 1851, within the boundaries of the present state at Fort Laramie, near the mouth of the Laramie River. His assistants, Frs. De Vos, Hoecken, and Mengarini, also ministered to Indians and early settlers, although no permanent missions were established. The region formed successively a part of the Vicariates Apostolic of Indian Territory and Nebraska, and of the Diocese of Omaha. On the appointment of the first bishop in 1887, the scattered population still made necessary arduous missionary labors. The Diocese of Cheyenne (q.v.) includes the state and the Yellowstone National Park. The U. S. Religious Census of 1916 gave the following statistics for church membership in Wyoming:

Xainctonge, Anne de, Venerable (1567-1621), foundress of the Society of St. Ursula of the Blessed Virgin, b. Dijon, France; d. Dôle. Like St. Angela Merici, she perceived the need of better education for her sex, and desired to imitate the work of the Jesuits. For the purpose of founding an uncelostered order of women, and opening public schools for girls, she established her first convent at Dôle in 1606. The company was founded with Our Lady as general, St. Ursula as lieutenant, and the Rule of St. Ignatius as the basis of perfection. Declared Venerable, 1900. Commemorated, 8 June.—C.E.

Xaverian Brothers (Congregation of the Brothers of St. Francis Xavier), an institute of laymen, founded by Theodore J. Ryken, at Bruges, Belgium, 1839, established as a teaching congregation under episcopal approbation. The rule, enjoining the usual simple vows and dedication to the instruction of youth, was framed by Fr. Van Herkoven, S.J. A school established at Bury, England, 1846, was removed to Manchester, 1856, and one at Hastings to Mayfield; a novitiate was established at Hammersmith, 1861, and a new school, called the Catholic Collegiate Institute, was opened at Victoria Park, Manchester, 1866. Clapham College, London, is an influential Catholic center. In the United States the congregation has flourished since 1854, with schools at Louisville, Baltimore, Boston, Richmond, and other important points. In the Belgian province, four houses, in addition to the mother-house, were established. A Brief of encouragement was granted by Pius IX, 1865. The constitutions were revised, 1919, in conformity with the New Code of Canon Law. The institute is governed by a superior-general, provincials, local superiors, and councils. A general chapter is held every six years. Statistics (for the United States): 5 colleges, 6 preparatory schools, 7 high schools, 17 parochial schools, 6 industrial schools and homes; 270 religious (professed), 29 scholastics and novices, 6540 boys.—C.E.

Ximénez de Cisneros, Francisco (1436-1517), Franciscan statesman, b. Torrelaguna, New Castle; d. Roa, near Valladolid. He was educated at Salamanca and Rome. Entering the Franciscan order, he became provincial in Castile, confessor to Queen Isabella, and in 1495 Abp. of Toledo and chancellor of Castile. Famous as a patron of learning, he founded the University of Alcalá in 1504; restored the ancient Mozarabic Rite at Toledo; and undertook the publication of the first Polyglot Bible (Complutensian), the Hebrew text being revised by Alfonso de Zamora, a converted Spanish rabbi. On the death of Philip of Burgundy, he was viceroy of the kingdom as the guardian for the insane Juana, and the next year named Grand Inquisitor of Castile and Leon. In 1507 he became cardinal, and in 1509 fitted out and led Ferdinand’s expedition against the Moors in Africa and took Oran by assault. He supported the Pope against France during the Fifth Lateran Council (1512). As regent on the death of Ferdinand, he moved the seat of the government from Guadalupe to Madrid, reformed the taxation laws, and was interested in the welfare of the natives of the Spanish-American possession.—C.E.

Yakima Indians, a Shoshonean tribe in eastern Washington. The name has been applied to all the Indians who observed the Treaty of 1855, by the terms of which 13 tribes surrendered their lands and agreed to form one body on the Yakima reservation. Of the 1900 Indians on the reservation, in 1909, comparatively few belonged to the original tribe. They formerly lived on salmon, roots, and berries, crossed the mountains to hunt the buffalo, and had tents of skins. Now they are engaged in agriculture and stockfarming. Converted by Jesuit missionaries, they are almost all Catholics.—C.E.

Yes, Heaven is the prize, hymn written by Rev. C. Vaughan.

York, ancient archdiocese, England. The earliest episcopal record is of 314, the first bishop of known date being St. Paulinus (625), co-founder of the diocese with St. Edwin, whose successor, St. Wilfrid, was not inducted until 664. The diocese’s metropolitanc, which disputed for precedence with Canterbury, and which, at the Norman Conquest, extended over Worcester, Lindsey, and Lincoln, the dioceses of Scotland, and of the Northern Isles, at that time included only Durham, Carlisle, Sodor and Man, and temporarily, Chester. Alcuin was at the head of its famous school, and its long episcopal list includes Thomas of Bayeux, the first Norman prelate; Scrope, and Wolsey. The last Catholic archbishop was Nicholas Heath (1555-79). The famous minster was completed in 1472.

York, Use of, the special liturgical customs which prevailed in the greater part of northern England during pre-Reformation days. They strongly resembled those of the Sarum Use, but certain differences may be noted in the celebration of Mass, the Breviary, the marriage service, and in the form for the administration of Extreme Unction. A special calendar of feasts was followed, particular feasts were observed, and the liturgical colors varied. For details of the customs consult Dr. Henderson's edition of the York Missal (pp. 257, sqq.); and Jour. Theol. Stud., II, 583.—C.E.

Young, John B. (1854-1927), one of the greatest American authorities on church music, b. Haguenau, Alsace, Germany; d. Monroe, N. Y. Educated at the college of Haguenau and the Jesuit College at Amiens, France, he entered the Society of Jesus, 1872; was ordained, 1879; professor and musical director (1875-81) at St. Francis Xavier’s College, N. Y.; choirmaster (1881-1900) and musical moderator (1900-22) at St. Francis Xavier’s Church, N. Y., where he founded the famous boy choir. He was a member of the Music Commission of the Archdiocese of New York, and honorary associate of the American Guild of Organists. Fr. Young was appointed to the Papal Commission for the revision of ritual music in the Church, and compiled the Roman Hymnal (N. Y., 1881), a standard work for Catholic devotions and ritual. He developed the system of voice-training used in the Justine Ward method of teaching Gregorian chant. By his high ideals he raised the standard of church music throughout the United States.

Young Men’s Institute, The, a Catholic fraternal association founded in San Francisco, Cal., 4 March, 1883. Its purposes are the mutual benefit of its members, their improvement along moral, social, and intellectual lines, and the development of their loyalty to Church and country. The entire society is divided into subordinate councils and Grand Council jurisdictions, all of which are under the jurisdiction of a Supreme Council. In addition to its several branches in various states, it has branches in Canada, and the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands.—C.E.

Young Men’s Society of Great Britain, Catholic, founded by Dean O’Brien of Limerick in 1849. Its objects are mutual improvement and the extension of the spirit of religion by prayer and frequentation of the sacraments. The fundamental rules are: monthly communion; exclusion of party politics; and the power of veto for the chaplain of each branch. The branches undertake all kinds of parish and recreational activities, including the establishing and staffing of conferences of the St. Vincent de Paul Society, providing church collectors, and registration of Catholic voters. The Executive Council has headquarters in Liverpool. The present membership shows 258 branches in Great Britain, totaling approximately 30,000 members.

Youth, Impediment of, is a matrimonial impediment. A contract made by a very young child is evidently of no value. Under the New Code, boys cannot validly marry until they have completed their 16th year; and girls, their 14th year. Under old laws the ages were 14 and 12 respectively.

Youville, Marie Marguerite b’, née Dufrêne de Chambéry (1701-71), foundress of the Grey Nuns, or Sisters of Charity of the General Hospital of Montreal, b. Varennes, near Montreal. Left a widow with three small children, and in straitened circumstances, she devoted herself to charity, and gathering a few companions formed the nucleus of her order. In 1747 they were entrusted with the management of the General Hospital, founded by M. Charbon (1694) and at this time heavily in debt. They succeeded in reorganizing the institution and opened it to disabled soldiers, the insane, incurables, foundlings, and orphans. In 1755 the Rule of their... institute was confirmed. The cause of the beatification of the foundress was introduced in 1890.—

Zabulon, one of the twelve sons of Jacob, ancestor of the tribe of the same name which plays an important part in Israelite history. The territory of the latter began with Sirid (Jos., 19), about 5 m. sw. of Nazareth, and included the land near Carmel and the sea, as far as the Lake of Genesaret, and part of the Plain of Esdraelon, and was largely the scene of Christ's life and labors as related in the Gospels.—C.E.

Zaccaria, Francesco Antonio (1714-95), theologian and historian, b. Venice; d. Rome. He joined the Society of Jesus, 1731, and subsequently became professor of Church history at Sapienza and director of the Accademia de' Nobili Ecclesiastici. His numerous works include the "Thesaurus Theologicus," a compilation of theological treatises of various authors, "Opera theologica-canonica," "Historia Ecclesiastica," several other works on theology, church history, and canon law, and annotated editions of Menochius, Dante, Tamburnini, and others. —C.E.

Zacharias, Book or, a prophetic book containing, relatively to its contents the greatest number of predictions regarding Christ. The first part (chaps. 1-6) is to encourage the temple-builders. Three visions concern the foundation of the Messianic kingdom. The fourth offers the promise of "my servant, the Orient," who is also the subject of the symbolic crowning of Jesus. The fourth to sixth visions are concerned with Christ, the Priest and King. An address (Chaps. 7, 8) stresses the keeping of the commandments; the Messianic promises should be an incentive. The remainder consists of two burdens: one (chap. 9) over Syria, Phenicia, and Philistia, contains the prophecy of Palm Sunday and the purchase of Haceldalna for the treason-money of Judas; the second (chap. 12) is a burden on Israel. The authenticity of the burdens has been attacked by critics, but their reasons are insufficient as they are mostly from differences of style, and supposed differences of material. The author calls himself, "son of Barachias, son of Addo," and dates his prophecies in the 2nd and 4th years of Darius, beginning two months later than Aggeus, Addo, his grandfather, returned from captivity with Zerorabel. The prophet was likewise a priest (Neh., 12). The Septuagint attributes to him Psalms 93-98. He is very likely not the prophet "slain between the temple and the altar" (Matt., 23).—C.E., XV, 741; Gigot.

Zachary, Saint, priest of the family of Abia; husband of Saint Elizabeth; father of St. John the Baptist. He is mentioned prominently in Luke, 1. Zachary seems to have doubted the word of the angel who appeared to him in the Temple at the offering of the morning incense, saying that Elizabeth, already advanced in years, should bear a son. For this he was struck dumb; he recovered the power of speech at the circumcision and naming of John, and praised God mightily in the Canticle "Benedictus" (Luke, 1).—Ollivier, tr. Keogh, Friendships of Jesus, St. L., 1903. (J. M. N.)

Zachary or Zacharias (Heb., zachariah, remembered by Jehovah), Saint, Pope (741-752), b. Calabria, Italy, of Greek parentage; d. Rome. As pope, by personal influence he concluded a peace between the Roman duchy and the Lombards, whom he induced to abandon the attack on Ravenna. He held a synod in Rome, 743, to regulate Church discipline; encouraged the missionary work of St. Boniface in Germany, and extended his work to France; and confirmed the election of Pepin, mayor of the palace, as King of the Franks, after the decay of the Merovingian dynasty. In the vicinity of Rome he established agricultural colonies, coined money, and built churches and dwelling-places for the poor. He translated into Greek the "Dialogues" of Saint Gregory I. Feast, 13 March.—C.E.; Mann; Butler.

Zachi, chief of the publicans in Jericho. He received Jesus into his house with great joy; and despite the temptations of his position he must have been an honest man, for he protested to the Lord: "Behold the half of my goods I give to the poor, and if I have wronged any man of anything, I restore him fourfold" (Luke, 19).—J. Zanzibar, Vicariate Apostolic of, Zanzibar, VICARIATE APPOSTOLIC OF, Zanzibar is an important part in Israelite history. The territory of the latter began with Sirid (Jos., 19), about 5 m. sw. of Nazareth, included the land near Carmel and the sea, as far as the Lake of Genesaret, and was largely the scene of Christ's life and labors as related in the Gospels.—C.E.

Zeeel (Gr., zoe, to boil), love in action; a vehement emotion of soul, based on deep affection, that seeks to obtain possession of the object or the person loved, and to exclude whatever might prevent or destroy such union, or harm the person loved. In the religious life, zeal is founded on the love of God and manifests itself in strong desire and ardent action to propagate the Faith, to sanctify souls, and to promote the glory of God by making Him better known, loved, and honored.—C.E.

Zealots, a Jewish faction which arose in Judæa, in the days preceding the Roman siege of Jerusalem.
They pretended great zeal for the Jewish rights, but this was a mere pretense. In reality they were lawless murderers and robbers, who made use of the calamitous times to practise all manner of violence. Flavius Josephus, their contemporary, accurately described their character and their deeds (Jewish War, IV, iii, 9; VII, viii, 1). They were led by John of Gischala, an unscrupulous and cunning man, who invited the Idumaeans to come to their help in their career of crime. In the destruction of Jerusalem many of the zealots were destroyed. Some fled into other lands. The Apostle Simon is called Zealotes in Luke, 6. Some believe that before his call he belonged to the Zealots; it is far more probable that he received his surname from his sincere love of the Messiah.

Zephyrinus, Saint, Pope (189-217), b. Rome; d. there. Little is known of his pontificate, except that the Emperor Septinlius Severus passed the edict of persecution, 202, forbidding conversions to Christianity and Judaism; and that heretical leaders, among them Hippolytus, Theodotus the Tanner, Theodotus the Money Changer, Aselepodotus, Proclus, and Artemon, disturbed his reign. Feast, R. Cal., 26 Aug.—C. E.; Butler.

Zita, Saint, virgin (1218-71), b. Monsagratati, Tuscany; d. Lucca. She was a servant in the household of the Fatinelli family of Lucca, from the age of twelve until her death. Her piety, humility, and exactitude in performing her domestic duties, in which she regarded herself as the servant of God rather than of man, won the love and respect of her employers and fellow-servants. She is especially venerated in Lucca, where the poets Dante and Fazio degli Uberti called “Santa Zita.” A community of sisters named after her, in New York, takes care of women who need help and protection from evil surroundings. Patroness of domestic servants. Canonized, 1896. Relics in St. Frigidiana's church, Lucca. Feast, 27 April.—C. E.; Butler.

Zoology (Gr., zoos, a living thing; logos, science), that branch of the science of biology which treats of animals. It includes entomology, the science of insects; herpetology, the science of serpents; ichthyology, the science of fishes and aquatic vertebrates; mammalogy, the science of mammals; and ornithology, the science of birds. Among those famed in this science are the following. CATHOLICS. Pierre Joseph Van Beneden (1809-94), pioneer in the study of parasitic worms, first discovered that intestinal worms must pass through different animals before they reach full development, and did important research on litoral fauna, flora, and paleontology. Armand David (1826-1900), Vincentian, made innumerable contributions to the zoological knowledge of China, discovered 63 new species of wild animals, 65 of birds, and made a famous collection of mammals. Arnold Forster (1810-94), made distinguished additions to the knowledge of Microhymenoptera. Fortunata of Brescia (1701-54), pioneer in morphology, did important microscopic research work, notably in classifying organs and tissues. Jean Théodore Lacoardaire (1801-70), celebrated in entomology, particularly for his colossal work on the genera of coleoptera. André Latreille (1762-1833), priest, considered the founder of modern entomology, incrased the number of insect genera, made the initial grouping of genera into families, and was the author of several standard works on entomology. OTHER CHRISTIAN ZOOLOGISTS. Louis Rudolph Agassiz (1807-73), noted ichthyologist, drew up a new ichthyological classification based on the results of his research on fossil ichthyology, and made a famous collection of marine zoology. He also made valuable contributions to geology, notably his original work on glaciers. John James Audubon (1780-1851), famous in ornithology, author of ornithological works, in whose honor the Audubon societies (ornithological) are so called. Karl Ernst Von Baer (1792-1876), father of comparative embryology, noted for his investigations on the embryology of vertebrata. Charles Bonnet (1720-93) first described parthenogenetic reproduction, did valuable research on aphids, and discovered the proper method of respiration of butterflies and caterpillars. Christian Gottfried Ehrenberg (1795-1876), famed for his work on the infusoria, discovered the composition of certain rocks to be of microscopic plants and animals, first proved that organisms were responsible for marine phosphorescence, and did significant research on corals. Daniel Frederick Eseckricht (1718-1863), author of several zoological works, organized a famous zoological collection which has been given to the Zoological Museum of Copenhagen. Sir Richard Owen (1804-92) did famous research on the comparative anatomy of the higher vertebrata, and on extinct birds, mammals, and reptiles, inaugurated the term dinosauria for extinct land reptiles, made valuable contributions to the knowledge of invertebrata, notably his researches on the pearly nautilus, in which connection he wrote a classic treatise, took the major part in organizing the British National Museum of Natural History, and was the author of several standard treatises on zoology and comparative anatomy; his “Odontology” is particularly noteworthy.—Kneller, Christianity and the Leaders of Modern Science, St. L., 1911; Murray, Science and Scientists in the Nineteenth Century, N. Y., 1825; Whitehead, Science and the Modern World, N. Y., 1925.

Zoroaster (Avesta, zarathustra, meaning uncertain), author of Zoroastrianism, the religious system of the Perso-Iranian people. The facts of his life are uncertain. He was probably born in Western Iran, c. 700-600 B.C., or earlier, but accomplished his work in Eastern Iran. His teachings, which are contained in the Avesta, advocated the adoration of the good spirit Ormuzd, abhorrence of the evil spirit, and the achievement of purity of soul and body. There is scarcely any mention of ceremonial worship. Under the Achaemenides, Zoroastrianism became the religion of the East. It fell into neglect after Alexander's conquest of Persia (334-331 B.C.), was revived A.D. 227, only to be replaced by Mohammedanism, A.D. 641. The doctrine was too abstract and spiritual for the popular mind and gradually evolved into the religious system of the Parsis (q.v.).—C.E.; ZOROBEL (IEb., offspring of Babel), son of Salathiel (1 Esd., 3); with Josue, the high-priest, leader of the Jews returning from the Babylonian exile. They set up an altar for burnt-offerings in Jerusalem, kept the Feast of Tabernacles and began to rebuild the Temple. In the beginning of the reign of Darius, Zorobabel was governor of Judah. He was one of the ancestors of Christ (Luke, 3).

Zosimus, Saint, Pope (417-418), b. Rome; d. Rome. During his pontificate he instituted a Vice-archiepiscopal at Arles for southern Gaul; upheld the rights of the Holy See against the bishops of North Africa in the matter of appeals; and condemned Pelagianism, 418, in his "Epistola Tractoria" which was sent to all the Church provinces in the world. Feast, 30 Dec.—C.E.; Grisar.

Zouaves, Pontifical, volunteer military corps organized at Rome by Louis Lamoricière, 1860, to defend the papal states; its members were chiefly French and Belgians. In 1870, after Rome had been occupied by Victor Emmanuel the Pontifical Zouaves served the government of National Defense in France and were disbanded after the Germans entered Paris during the Franco-Prussian War, 1870.

Zucchetto (It., zucca, head), small round skull-cap, worn by ecclesiastics; white for Pope, red for cardinals, purple for bishops, black for abbots.—C.E.

Zumarraga, Juan de (1468-1548), Franciscan, first Bp. of Mexico, b. Durango, in the Basque provinces; d. Mexico. As he had only the title of bishop-elect and Protector of the Indians, when he left Spain for Mexico in 1528, his first years were marred by the disastrous administration of Nuño de Guzmán and the auditors, Matienzo and Delgadillo. After his consecration in Spain, in 1533, he returned to Mexico only to be involved in several difficulties concerning baptism, marriage, and the position of the regulars. He secured the modification of the "Nuevas Leyes," thus saving Mexico from a bloody civil struggle. To him is due the school for Indian girls, the famous Colegio Tlatelolco and the introduction of the printing-press in the New World.—C.E.; ZOROBEL (IEb., offspring of Babel), son of Salathiel (1 Esd., 3); with Josue, the high-priest, leader of the Jews returning from the Babylonian exile. They set up an altar for burnt-offerings in Jerusalem, kept the Feast of Tabernacles and began to rebuild the Temple. In the beginning of the reign of Darius, Zorobabel was governor of Judah. He was one of the ancestors of Christ (Luke, 3).

Zwingli, Ulrich (1484-1531), founder of the Reformation in Switzerland, b. Wildhaus, Switzerland; d. near Kappel. After completing studies in theology at Berne, Vienna, and Basel, he was made pastor of Glarus (1500-10). An ardent supporter of humanism, he was conspicuous for political activity, more interested in secular disputes than doctrinal innovations, until 1522 when he attacked the ecclesiastical law of fasting and asserted that the Bible was the sole rule of faith. The town council of Zurich accepted the innovations of Zwingli after presentation of his 67 theses, 1523, and in the following year church property was seized by the state, and abolition of the sacraments, celibacy, indulgences, veneration of images, and good works was begun. In 1525 the Mass was replaced by the memorial service of the Last Supper. The Catholic cantons united against him, and in a public disputation held at Baden, 1525, Johann Eck of Ingolstadt won a complete victory for the old Faith. In 1528 Borne adopted the heresy as completely as Zurich, and to force the new doctrines on the Catholic cantons, Zwingli urged civil war. His insolvency as ecclesiastical and political leader of Zurich forced the Catholics to arms. Thusius, while Zwingli fell in battle, 1531. Interpretation of his doctrine was developed by his successor, Heinrich Bullinger (1504-75), whose attempt at union with Luther on the question of the Lord's Supper failed, though he reached an agreement with Calvin on the question at Geneva, 1543. The "Second Helvetic Confession," published 1566, expressing Bullinger's personal religious conviction, was recognized by all Evangelical Churches except Basel.—C.E.

Zyll (Zyllus), Otto van (1588-1656), humanist, b. Utrecht, Netherlands; d. Mechlin, Belgium. Upon the advice of Jansenius he entered the Society of Jesus, 1606, and became director of the colleges of Bois-le-Duc, Bruges, and Brussels successively. He wrote Latin poems and translated lives of the saints from Greek. Many conversions have been attributed to him.—Southwell, Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jesu.
In the following pages the editors have attempted to name the best available books by Catholic authors, and books by others which are Catholic in spirit and content. They welcome criticisms and suggestions which may help to make the lists perfect. They will also be pleased to obtain copies of these books for purchasers at the current prices.

This Dictionary is largely the work of the American clergy who have contributed most of the articles in it gratis.

It is dedicated to the Holy Father, the librarian pontiff, as a jubilee testimonial from the faithful in America.

This dedication is made in the name of the contributors and of all who have kindly acted as underwriters of the first edition.
